

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

Arch.
ND
205
.C13

THE STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

JAMES A. McNEILL WHISTLER

ed from the Japanese. There is the sitting and unusual form of the figure outside the picture, so characteristic lady in the riding habit looks out of something again outside the picture.
 in and the actual figure, and again the white in its proper place behind these things represented new technical ection of Colonel Frank J. Hecker

PRINTING

IN AMERICA

TO

IN COMPANY

Copyright, 1907, by FREDERICK A. STOKES COMPANY
October, 1907
All rights reserved

101 arab. lib.

gift Heins of W. H. Wait
v. 11.41

AUTHOR'S NOTE

My aim has been to trace the growth of American Painting from its scanty beginnings in Colonial times up to its abundant harvest in the Present. At first the story is necessarily associated with the efforts of a few individuals. Later, however, as students in increasing numbers seek instruction abroad, it becomes concerned less with individuals than with principles of motives and method. The influence, in turn, of England, Dusseldorf, Munich, and Paris, is discussed, and allusion to individuals is introduced mainly in illustration of the general theme. I have tried, in fact, not only to help the reader to a knowledge of some few painters; but, much more, to put him in possession of a basis of appreciation, on which he may form judgments for himself of the work that is being done to-day by American artists.

CHARLES H. CAFFIN.

NEW YORK, September 23, 1907.

CONTENTS

CHAPTER	PAGE
I. COLONIAL AND REVOLUTIONARY CONDITIONS .	1
II. PAINTERS IN AMERICA AFTER THE CONCLUSION OF PEACE	23
III. THE GROWTH OF THE NATIONAL SPIRIT .	46
IV. A NATIVE GROWTH OF LANDSCAPE PAINTING .	66
V. REMNANTS OF THE ENGLISH INFLUENCE .	85
VI. THE INFLUENCE OF DÜSSELDORF AND MUNICH .	103
VII. THE BEGINNING OF FRENCH INFLUENCE: THE BARBIZON	121
VIII. JOHN LA FARGE	144
IX. FRENCH INFLUENCE—THE ACADEMIC .	159
X. CONTINUANCE OF BARBIZON INFLUENCE, AND SOME EXAMPLES OF INDEPENDENCE .	198
XI. FRENCH INFLUENCE CONTINUED: REALISM AND IMPRESSIONISM	229
XII. FURTHER STUDY OF LIGHT AND PROGRESS OF LANDSCAPE	262
XIII. WHISTLER	285
XIV. SOME NOTES ON MURAL PAINTING .	304
XV. SUMMARY OF RESULTS	332
XVI. SUMMARY CONTINUED	361

ILLUSTRATIONS

THE MUSIC ROOM James A. McNeill Whistler Frontispiece

	PAGE
  PORTRAIT OF MRS. ROBERT WEIR   Artist Unknown . . .   3
  PORTRAIT OF MRS. NORTON QUINCEY   Artist Unknown . . .   4
  PORTRAIT OF JOHN LOVELL   John Smibert . . .   7
  HAGAR AND ISHMAEL . . .   Benjamin West . . .   8
  PORTRAIT OF C. W. PEALE .   Benjamin West . . .   13
  PORTRAIT OF LADY WENTWORTH   John Singleton Copley .   14
  MR. AND MRS. IZZARD . . .   John Singleton Copley ..   19
  PORTRAIT OF COLONEL EPES SARGENT   John Singleton Copley .   20
  PORTRAIT OF MRS. REID IN THE CHARACTER OF A SULTANA   Robert Edge Pine . . .   27
  THE AMERICAN SCHOOL .   Matthew Pratt . . .   28
  PORTRAIT OF WASHINGTON .   C. W. Peale   33
  THE ARTIST IN HIS MUSEUM   C. W. Peale   34
  THE "ATHENAEUM PORTRAIT" OF WASHINGTON   Gilbert Stuart   39
  PORTRAIT OF DR. FOTHERGILL   Gilbert Stuart   40
  PORTRAIT OF ALEXANDER HAMILTON   John Trumbull   51
  BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL .   John Trumbull   52
  A SPANISH GIRL   Washington Allston .   57
  THE DEAD MAN RESTORED TO LIFE   Washington Allston .   58
  PORTRAIT OF THE ARTIST .   John Vanderlyn . . .   61

ILLUSTRATIONS

	PAGE
ARIADNE OF NAXOS John Vanderlyn	62
DESTRUCTION Thomas Cole	67
THE EXPULSION FROM PARADISE Thomas Cole	68
LANDSCAPE Asher B. Durand	73
ON THE HUDSON Thomas Doughty	74
SCENE AT NAPONACH William Hart	79
YOSEMITE VALLEY Albert Bierstadt	80
COTOPAXI Frederick E. Church	83
SHOSHONE FALLS, SNAKE RIVER, IDAHO Thomas Moran	84
PORTRAIT OF ELIZA LESLIE Thomas Sully	91
PORTRAIT OF DANIEL WEBSTER Chester Harding	92
PORTRAIT OF THE ARTIST Charles Loring Elliott	95
HEELS OVER HEAD J. G. Brown	96
WASHINGTON CROSSING THE DELAWARE Emanuel Leutze	107
GIRL AND PETS Eastman Johnson	108
TWO MEN Eastman Johnson	111
WELL AND WATER TANK, ITALIAN VILLA Frank Duveneck	112
ELIZABETH BOOTT DUENECK Frank Duveneck	115
LADY WITH THE WHITE SHAWL William M. Chase	116
SUMMER IDYLL Walter Shirlaw	119
MOTHER AND CHILD William Morris Hunt	120
THE BOY AND THE BUTTERFLY William Morris Hunt	131
THE BATHERS William Morris Hunt	132
MIDSUMMER George Inness	137
EARLY MOONRISE—FLORIDA George Inness	138
PEACE AND PLENTY George Inness	141
THE GOLDEN AGE John La Farge	142
POMONA John La Farge	147
CHRIST AND NICODEMUS John La Farge	148
AUTUMN John La Farge	157
THE PORTRAIT Will H. Low	158

ILLUSTRATIONS

	PAGE
ARIADNE	Wyatt Eaton . . . 169
THE REFLECTION	Benjamin R. Fitz . . 170
THE KEEPER OF THE THRESH-
OLD	Elihu Vedder . . . 175
ARCADIA	H. Siddons Mombray . 176
THE SCULPTOR AND THE KING	George de Forest Brush 179
PORTRAIT GROUP	George de Forest Brush 180
VIRGIN ENTHRONED . . .	Abbot H. Thayer . . 183
CARITAS	Abbot H. Thayer . . 184
THE LOOK-OUT—ALL'S WELL	Winslow Homer . . . 187
THE SPINET	T. W. Dewing . . . 188
LE JASEUR	T. W. Dewing . . . 191
LA PÊCHE	T. W. Dewing . . . 192
TRIAL OF QUEEN KATHERINE	Edwin A. Abbey . . . 195
THE CONNECTICUT VALLEY	Alexander H. Wyant . 196
ADIRONDACK VISTA . . .	Alexander H. Wyant . 201
OLD CHURCH IN NORMANDY	Homer D. Martin . . . 202
WESTCHESTER HILLS . . .	Homer D. Martin . . . 207
VIEW ON THE SEINE . . .	Homer D. Martin . . . 208
THE FIRE WORSHIPPERS .	Homer D. Martin . . . 211
LANDSCAPE	Henry W. Ranger . . . 212
THE BROOK BY MOONLIGHT	Ralph A. Blakelock . . 215
SIEGFRIED	Albert P. Ryder . . . 216
THE FLYING DUTCHMAN .	Albert P. Ryder . . . 219
THE ICE CUTTERS	Horatio Walker . . . 220
THE WOOD CUTTERS . . .	Horatio Walker . . . 223
SHEEP WASHING	Horatio Walker . . . 224
AVE MARIA	Horatio Walker . . . 227
DR. GROSS' SURGICAL CLINIC	Thomas Eakins 228
THE WEST WIND	Winslow Homer . . . 235
THE CASTAWAY	Winslow Homer . . . 236
AN INTERLUDE	Sergeant Kendall . . . 239
SEA AND ROCKS	Paul Dougherty . . . 240
CALM BEFORE A STORM . .	Allen B. Talcott . . . 243
MRS. CARL MEYER AND CHIL-
DREN	John S. Sargent . . . 244

ILLUSTRATIONS

	PAGE
PORTRAIT OF MISS BEATRICE GOELET John S. Sargent	247
PORTRAIT OF HENRY G. MAR- QUAND John S. Sargent	248
PORTRAIT GROUP John S. Sargent	251
A PORTRAIT STUDY Irving R. Wiles	252
MISS KITTY J. J. Shannon	255
PORTRAIT OF ADELAIDE NUT- TING Cecilia Beaux	256
PORTRAIT OF MRS. THOMAS HASTINGS John W. Alexander	259
PORTRAIT Wilton Lockwood	260
LADY IN BLACK Robert Henri	263
AGAINST THE SKY Frank W. Benson	264
THE WAVE Alexander Harrison	267
CALM MORNING Frank W. Benson	268
GIRLS READING Edmund C. Tarbell	271
A GENTLEWOMAN J. Alden Weir	272
THE FARM IN WINTER J. Alden Weir	275
LISTENING TO THE ORCHARD ORIOLE Childe Hassam	276
LORELEI Childe Hassam	279
A RAINY NIGHT Childe Hassam	280
THE HEMLOCK POOL John W. Twachtman	283
FEBRUARY John W. Twachtman	284
PORTRAIT OF THE ARTIST'S MOTHER James A. McNeill Whistler	293
PORTRAIT OF CARLYLE James A. McNeill Whistler	294
AT THE PIANO James A. McNeill Whistler	297
PORTRAIT OF MISS ALEXANDER James A. McNeill Whistler	298
THE ASCENSION John La Farge	309
THE FEET WASHERS W. B. Van Ingen	310
THE BURNING OF THE "PEGGY STEWART," AT ANNAPOLIS, IN 1774 C. Y. Turner	317
PITTSBURGH PERSONIFIED John W. Alexander	318

ILLUSTRATIONS

	PAGE
THE TRIUMPH OF MINNESOTA Edwin H. Blashfield	321
THE DOGMA OF REDEMPTION John S. Sargent	322
THE TREATY OF THE TRA- VERSE DES SIOUX . . . Frank D. Millet	327
ROME Elihu Vedder	328
ON THE CANAL W. L. Lathrop	333
PITTSBURGH Colin Campbell Cooper	334
SOLITUDE Charles Melville Dewey	337
THE CLOUD Albert L. Groll	338
MAY NIGHT Willard L. Metcalf	341
THE ROAD TO THE OLD FARM J. Francis Murphy	342
EARLY SPRING Leonard Ochtman	345
THE VALLEY Edward W. Redfield	346
THE SLUICE Frederick Ballard Williams	349
THE SHEPHERDESS Gari Melchers	350
MOTHER AND CHILD Gari Melchers	353
THE SAILOR AND HIS SWEET- HEART Gari Melchers	354
PORTRAIT OF A LADY Robert David Gauley	357
LADY WITH MUFF Robert David Gauley	358
THE SILVER GOWN Howard J. Cushing	363
THE MYSTERIES OF NIGHT J. Humphreys Johnston	364
EUROPA SIBYL Hugo Ballin	367
BOYS WITH FISH Charles W. Hawthorne	368
SPANISH FÊTE F. Luis Mora	371
EASTER EVE John Sloan	372
DUMPING SNOW George Luks	375
EAST SIDE PICTURE Jerome Myers	376
NEW ENGLAND FARM IN WIN- TER Dwight W. Tryon	379
TWILIGHT—AUTUMN Dwight W. Tryon	380
MOONLIGHT Dwight W. Tryon	383
LAKE GEORGE Eduard J. Steichen	384

THE STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

The Story of American Painting

CHAPTER I

COLONIAL AND REVOLUTIONARY CONDITIONS

IN 1784 the House met in Philadelphia to ratify the Treaty of Peace. After seven years of struggle the United States of America had shaken off the foreign yoke and were commencing another struggle of seven years among themselves before their full birthright as a united nation should be established. Once more, as during the much longer struggle of the United Provinces against Spain, a new nation had been born, and a combination of racial energy and local advantages was to produce an extraordinary harvest of national development. But it was not to include, as in the case of Holland, an immediate development in the art of painting.

For the latter, something more is needed than a virgin soil, spotted over, as in pre-Revolutionary America, with a few isolated growths, struggling bravely, but at a disadvantage, in an uncongenial environment. Wherever in the world painting has flourished, it has done so after a period of development, gradually enriched by the accumulation of local or borrowed traditions, until at length it has blossomed into independent vigour.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Such scatterings of tradition as existed during the Colonial period had been derived from England, and reflected mostly the poor conditions of English portrait painting which prevailed before the rise of Reynolds and Gainsborough. Even the influence of the latter, when it came to be established, was overshadowed, so far as Americans were concerned, by that of their countryman, West, whose extraordinary reputation among his contemporaries has not been sustained by subsequent judgment.

Nor in the years preceding the Revolution had the scanty traditions of painting been favoured by local environments. Men's minds were turned to other things than art, and the only conception held of painting was as a means of producing portraits. In the language of the times, the "limner" (this title itself a corruption of the old English word "illuminer," namely, of manuscripts) was spoken of as having an accurate "pencil" in the delineation of "counterfeit presentments." The school from which he had graduated was more than seldom that of carriage painting.

* * * * *

Such had been the start of John Smibert, a native of Edinburgh. He reached this country in 1720, three years after the arrival of Peter Pelham,

ERMAN, 1170-1197

manner of the great English of the Worcester Art Museum

Colonial dame by some unknown

In the collection of the Worcester Art Museum

COLONIAL CONDITIONS

portrait painter and mezzotint engraver, and seven years after that of the Swedish painter, Gustavus Hesselius, who is credited with having been the earliest painter in this country. In England Smibert had had the good fortune to be taken up by Dean, afterwards Bishop, Berkeley, accompanying him to Italy, and later to Rhode Island, when the philosopher-philanthropist came over to found a missionary college in this country for the conversion of the Indians. At what is now Middletown, three miles from Newport, Berkeley bought an estate which he called Whitehall, and for two years and a half officiated at Trinity Church, Newport, visited the Narragansett Indians, and worked upon his book, "The Minute Philosopher," writing the greater part of it in a crevice in the cliffs overlooking the sea. It was at this time that Smibert executed the portrait group of Berkeley surrounded by his family, which picture, together with the Dean's library of a thousand volumes, became the property of Yale College. When, in consequence of the failure of the home government to give financial support to his scheme, Berkeley returned to England, Smibert established himself in Boston, and lived there until his death in 1751.

It is characteristic of the times that his sitters were chiefly the New England divines, those leaders of a stern theocracy that exercised political as well as spiritual authority. Think of the mental and moral atmosphere which surrounded the beginnings in this country of an art which we regard to-day as making an appeal to our æsthetic sensations. Not even in the sister art of literature, though much had been written, had any work of the imagination been produced, nor would be until after 1820. Upon political pamphlets, or local records of places, persons, and events, the writers had expended their activity; their intellectual force upon the subtleties of religious controversy. Such appeals as had been made to men's imaginations were of the kind that may be read in the sermons of Jonathan Edwards, whose keen mind revelled in analysing the vividly imagined horrors of hell.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

"O sinner," he preached,* "consider the fearful danger you are in; it is a great furnace of wrath, that you are held over in the hands of that God, whose wrath is provoked and incensed, as much against you, as against many of the damned in hell!—you hang by a slender thread, with the flames of divine wrath flashing about it, and ready every moment to singe it and burn it asunder. It is everlasting wrath. You will know certainly that you will wear out long ages, millions and millions of ages, in wrestling and conflicting with this Almighty merciless vengeance; and then, when you have so done, when so many ages have actually been spent by you in this manner, you will know that all is but a point of what remains."

Nor was this awful fate to be avoided by a man's

* "Sinners in the hands of an Angry God."—Jonathan Edwards.

JOHN SMIBERT

John Smibert, "Master Lovell" became in 1729 usher of the Senate to 1775. Being of loyalist persuasion, he died there two years later.

Department of Harvard University, Cambridge praised for the "grand style" among eighteenth century; it is sweetened sentimentality.

BENJAMIN WEST

Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York

COLONIAL CONDITIONS

own doing. All humanity—men, women, and little children—all for the sin of one man and one woman, were predestined to this horror for eternity; only the “goodness” of God selected at gracious random a few souls from damnation. These were conscious of being saved, and were correspondingly puffed up with self-satisfied righteousness. All their fellows lay under the thick pall of eternal wrath; by it was darkened the sky of their lives; lives already hardened through long conflict with severe physical conditions and inured to the constant presence of death and danger. What wonder that their hardy and indomitable natures took refuge in a grim and strenuous severity. The theatre in New England was proscribed. Even as late as 1784 Massachusetts re-enacted the earlier sharp laws against the stage; and New York and Philadelphia still frowned upon it.

To this mental and moral rigour, however, the Southern States presented a notable contrast. Baltimore was a warm supporter of the drama, and much addicted to balls and routs, while the open-air promenades of gaily-dressed people, with their scenes of courtship and merriment, were a distinguished feature of her social life. Charleston also was famous for wealth and gaiety and for the elegance of her homes. In these and in the country mansions, thickly sown over the Southern States, were to be found most of the pictures which had been imported from Europe. It would seem as if the conditions of life among these descendants of cavalier settlers should have been favourable to art, yet it is a strange fact that it was not in the rich, luxurious South, but out of the flinty rigour of the North and East that American painting began its thrifty growth. Some of the painters, it is true, made professional tours through the South, and Southerners, attracted to Philadelphia, when it became the capital of Government and fashion, were among the best patrons of the painters then established in that city. Nevertheless the fact remains, that not Charleston or Baltimore, but Philadelphia and Boston are the places chiefly identified with the early beginnings of American painting.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

* * * * *

In pre-Revolutionary times the most notable of the native-born painters were Benjamin West, John Singleton Copley, Charles Wilson Peale, and Gilbert Stuart. By his contemporaries West was regarded as a prodigy. That a child, born in 1738, in a Quaker village, Springfield, near Philadelphia, and reared among conditions of strict and primitive simplicity, should have evolved out of himself a craving to be an artist; that his earliest lessons in colour had been derived from the Indians, in the crude pigments of yellow, red, and blue with which they decorated their own persons; that, after the present of a paint box from a certain Mr. Pennington, the youth was able in time to produce results that secured him commissions for portraits in Philadelphia and later in New York, and eventually, in his twenty-second year, attracted a patron who provided the necessary means for his visit to Rome—all this seemed phenomenal. And so also was his reception when at length he arrived in London.

COLONIAL CONDITIONS

But from this point he belongs to England rather than to America; so completely that, when Reynolds died, West was elected President of the Royal Academy, and received the order of Knighthood. He died in 1820, and was buried with pomp in St. Paul's Cathedral.

It is true, however, that he had an indirect influence upon his countrymen, for his success fired their imaginations, and his assistance was generously given to American students who had found their way to London. Yet this influence was unfortunate. The English, giving him the privileges of a pampered child, had encouraged him in the direction in which Reynolds, fortunately for himself, had been discouraged. Accordingly, while some of West's portraits, such as that of C. W. Peale, possess considerable vivacity, his works of imagination are pompous and pretentious in conception, in technique tentative and clumsy. They created a taste for grandiloquent subject rather than for painter-like excellence of workmanship. But, as we shall frequently have occasion to notice, the general aim of painting in the nineteenth century, in which American painting will share, will be to get away from excessive preoccupation with subject, and more and more to develop the resources of painting, as an art, independent of literary alliances. So in this way, also, West is cut off from the stream of movement.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

On the other hand, John Singleton Copley, although he subsequently settled down in England, remains a vital factor in the story of American painting. He identified himself very closely with pre-Revolutionary times by the number of his portraits of eminent men and women; and is himself also distinguished even to this day for the life-like vivacity of these portraits and for his skill in painting. Indeed, this Boston painter, practically self-taught, and with no examples of painting to guide him, save the portraits by Smibert and such of West's as had found their way into the homes of the city, developed a facility of craftsmanship that, considering the straitness of his opportunity, is most remarkable. And it is to be observed that his powers were fully matured before he settled in England.

Copley's parents had come from Ireland, and settled in Boston to engage in the tobacco business. About the time of his son's birth (1787), the father, Richard Copley, died, and the boy was named after

BENJAMIN WEST

of the hand may be more suggestive of the New York Historical Society

JOHN SINGLETON COPLEY

Drawing and the metal-like textures, the

In the collection of the New York Public Library

COLONIAL CONDITIONS

his maternal grandfather, John Singleton, of Quinville Abbey, County Clare. Ten years later the mother married that Peter Pelham, painter and mezzotint-engraver and precursor of Smibert, who has been mentioned above. His assistance to young Copley, who early showed a gift for drawing, must have been considerable, especially as the stepfather taught him his own art of engraving. When Pelham died, in the same year as Smibert, Copley was fourteen, and for the rest had to be his own master. He had no lack of commissions, however, and his progress was rapid.

At this time Boston was a city of some eighteen thousand inhabitants, confined to three hills, which gave it its second name of Trimountain. As yet there was no bridge across the Charles River, and at high tides the city was cut off from connection with the mainland. The better class of dwellings were on the west side; houses of brick, with Corinthian pilasters adorning the façades, and columned porches covered with roses and honeysuckles, and approached by sandstone steps which led up from gardens filled with English elms and shrubs. The fine furniture in these dwellings was from England or France. Moreover, since Smibert's day the rigour of life was lessening. Two conditions had contributed to the change. In the first place, the domination of the divines had given way before the rising influence of laymen, such as Otis and Samuel

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Adams; men of broad culture who became by force of character and through their zeal in public affairs the natural leaders of the community. In the second place, class distinction had become more defined. The men and women who throng the canvases of Copley are conscious of their worth and importance, perhaps more than a little self-conscious. "Pride of birth had not then been superseded by pride of wealth. The distinction of gentle blood was cherished. Equality had begun to assert itself only as a political axiom; as a social principle, it had not dawned upon the ultra-reformers."

The Portrait of Lady Wentworth, painted when she was nineteen and the artist twenty-eight, shows him in full possession of his powers. It is true that the draperies are inclined to be metallic in texture, and the flesh parts marble-like in polish and hardness; indeed, that the various textures throughout the picture have a prevailing similarity of shining rigidity, since the suggestion of atmosphere is lacking, as it is more or less in all of Copley's works.

"Yet, the want of ease and nature in his portraits is as authentic as the costumes. They are generally dignified, elaborate, and more or less ostentatious and somewhat mechanical, but we recognise in these very traits the best evidence of their correctness. They illustrate the men and women of the day, when pride, decorum, and an elegance, sometimes ungraceful but always impressive, marked the dress and air of the higher classes. The hardness of the outlines and the semi-official aspect of the figures correspond with the spirit of those times." *

COLONIAL CONDITIONS

Despite, however, some deficiency of painter-like quality, the portrait of Lady Wentworth bears an impress of fine authority and is full of personal character.

This Boston belle, who is represented toying with the chain of a captive flying squirrel (a detail which Copley several times introduced into his pictures), was a daughter of Samuel Wentworth, and had been engaged to her cousin, John Wentworth, the last Royal Governor of New Hampshire. But, in pique at his prolonged absence on some affair of business, she married Theodore Atkinson, and it is as his wife that she is here represented. He died, however, in a few years, and within a fortnight of his funeral she married her old love. When the troubles with the Mother Country arose she accompanied her husband to England. He was appointed Governor of Nova Scotia, holding the position from 1792 to 1808, when he resigned, but continued to live in Halifax until his death in 1820. He had been created a baronet in 1795; and three years later Lady Frances was made a lady-in-waiting to Queen Charlotte, with permission, however, to live abroad. For eleven years she lived in Nova Scotia, and then returned to England, where she died in 1813.

Considered on the one hand solely as a personal document, this picture has extraordinary interest.

* Tuckerman's "Book of the Artists."

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

What an air of birth and breeding the lady exhibits, a consciousness of indisputable social rank and beauty; what a complete poise of self-possession, tintured, however, with just a flavour of prim severity! How the portrait vivifies a certain phase of the past to our imagination! Nor less remarkable is the technical charm of the picture, when one remembers out of what a poverty of artistic opportunity Copley had emerged to this proficiency. Only a few years separate his art from Smibert's, and yet it is as far in advance of the latter's as the freer social conditions of Copley's day surpass in attractiveness the narrow rigidity of Smibert's. And it is precisely these altered social conditions which had much, perhaps most, to do with Copley's achievement. Himself of good family, handsome, brilliant in manner, and early gaining skill and success as a painter, he moved in the best society, and dressed and lived in style. Within the limited range of New England life he played such a part as Van Dyck in his day played in the larger world of Antwerp and London. His art, moreover, has so much of the same kind of distinction as Van Dyck's that one hazards a belief it might have approached it very closely in degree of distinction also, had his early opportunities been as favourable.

In 1769, when he was thirty-two years old, Copley, now a thoroughly successful painter, married the daughter of Mr. Richard Clarke, a wealthy mer-

PORTRAIT OF MR. AND MRS. YZARD

JOHN S. COPLEY

THIS picture was painted during Copley's visit to Rome (1774-1776). It shows that he was influenced by the prevailing fashion for the "grand style." But while the paraphernalia of the background is absurdly affected, the figures are treated with a charming sincerity.

In the Collection of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts

JOHN S. COPLEY

...ation, attributed to the period before 1760.
...els was destroyed by the French. Some of ...e indemnity from the French government.

In the Collection of Mrs. G. M. Clements

COLONIAL CONDITIONS

chant and agent of the East India Company, to whom later was consigned that historic cargo of tea which was flung into Boston harbour. Anticipating the trouble with England, Copley went to Rome, where he painted the portrait of Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Izard, the former a wealthy planter of South Carolina, and his wife, before her marriage a Miss Alice DeLancey, of Mamaroneck, New York. Her figure, as she submits a sketch to her husband, is full of charm; but his exhibits Copley's weakest trait of hardness in drawing. Moreover, the elaborate artificiality of the whole composition, in so marked a contrast to the rather severe refinement of the earlier portrait, throws an interesting side-light, both on the influences he had encountered since leaving home and on his own predilections. We see that he had already come under the fascination of that pretentious grandiloquence which was passing for the "grand style" in Europe; and may judge from the rapidity with which he imitated this mannerism, that at heart he was disposed toward it. It is an interesting example of the artistic spirit, curbed by the narrowness of environment, such as Copley experienced in Boston, bursting forth under freer conditions. Unhappily, the latter, in his case, were inclined to be meretricious.

From Rome the painter went to London, where he was kindly received by West, and soon became popular with a public already familiar with his work through the exhibitions of the Royal Academy. His wife joined him, sailing in the last American ship which passed out of Boston harbour under the British ensign, and the rest of his life was spent in England. Here he gained a great reputation for historical pictures, such as The Death of Chatham. But they were little more than an aggregation of portraits, and do not compare in actual artistic merit with such a single portrait as that of Lady Wentworth. He died in 1815, at the age of seventy-eight, and was buried in the Church of St. John, at Croydon, near London. His son, under the title of Lord Lyndhurst, was three times Lord Chancellor of England.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

West had left this country before there was any suggestion of strained relations with England, and had become so identified with the latter that probably no question of choice of allegiance occurred to him. With Copley, however, it was different. Clearly in his case the instinct of the artist was stronger than that of the patriot. He was the first of a numerous band of American painters who have deliberately chosen to live in Europe, because there they could find an atmosphere more congenial to their art.

We have now to consider a group of men who, after studying abroad, with equal deliberation returned home or settled here, to throw in their lot with the new nation.

CHAPTER II

PAINTERS IN AMERICA AFTER THE CONCLUSION OF PEACE

AT the conclusion of peace, there were among the painters whose work attracts particular notice just four, practising their art in America. Of these, Joseph Wright was at Mount Vernon, painting portraits of General and Mrs. Washington to the order of the Count de Solms. A native of Bordentown, N. J., where he was born in 1756, he had been a pupil of West, and then visited Paris. Returning in 1783, he painted during the autumn of that year at headquarters, Princeton, a portrait of Washington, having first taken a plaster cast of the sitter's head. When the United States mint was established at Philadelphia, he was appointed designer and die-sinker, and there is reason to believe that the first coins and medals executed in this country were his handiwork. He died, a victim of the plague which ravaged Philadelphia, in 1793.

In the latter city were residing at the termination of the war the three others of the four painters alluded to above: Robert Edge Pine, Matthew Pratt, and C. W. Peale.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

For Boston's share in the story of American painting is by this time retrospective, and remained so until Stuart settled there ten years later. For the present the attractions of Philadelphia, as the seat of government and fashion, were superior. It was the biggest city in the country. No other could boast of so many streets, arranged with regularity and well paved, but so full of filth and dead cats and dogs that their condition was made the subject of a satire by Francis Hopkinson, better known as the author of the "Battle of the Kegs." No other city could boast so large a population or so much renown. There Franklin had made his discoveries, the Declaration of Independence had been signed, and Congress had deliberated. No other city was so rich, so extravagant, so fashionable. Lee, in his correspondence with Washington, described it as an attractive scene of amusements and debauch; and Lovel, also writing to Washington, had called it a place of crucifying expenses.* Moreover, her citizens had the shrewdness to permit one permanent theatre as a concession to the unregenerate taste of Senators and Congressmen; although there was a strong objection to legalising this new species of luxury and dissipation.

* * * * *

It was the Honourable Francis Hopkinson, mem-

. * J. B. McMaster.

AFTER THE CONCLUSION OF PEACE

tioned above, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, a graduate of Princeton, and an Admiralty Judge of Pennsylvania, who was the first in this country to sit to the Englishman, Pine. The latter, born in London in 1742, a son of John Pine the engraver, arrived in 1784, and settled in Philadelphia, causing no little stir by exhibiting privately to the select few—"the manners and morals of the Quaker City forbidding its exposure to the common eye"—the first cast of the "Venus de Medici" brought to this country.

It was his ambition, in which he anticipated Trumbull, to paint a series of historical pictures, commemorating the events of the Revolution and including portraits of the principal participants. For this purpose, in the intervals of his labours as a teacher of drawing and a painter of occasional portraits, he executed a number of "distinguished heads." Among the latter were studies of Washington, General Gates, Charles Carroll, and Baron Steuben. However, before he could realise his ambition, he died in 1790, at Philadelphia.

* * * * *

"At the corner of Spruce Street, in Philadelphia, a few years since," wrote Tuckerman in 1867, "hung a shop-sign, representing a cock in a barn-yard, which attracted much attention by its manifest superiority to such insignia in general." It was from the brush of Matthew Pratt (born at Philadelphia in 1734), who also executed a famous sign-board, containing portraits of leaders of the Convention of 1788, which used to hang at the corner of Chestnut and Fourth Streets.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

For in those days (I quote from J. B. McMaster) the numbering of shops and houses had not yet come into fashion, and every business street presented an endless succession of golden balls, of blue gloves, of crowns and sceptres, dogs and rainbows, elephants and horseshoes. They served sometimes as advertisements of the business, sometimes merely as designation of the shops, which were indicated popularly in the newspapers by their signs. The custom still lingers, but now we are accustomed to regard the sign as bearing a direct relation to the character of the business it advertises. One hundred years ago, however, no such relation was understood to exist, and it was not thought remarkable that Philip Freeman should keep his famous bookstore at Boston at the "Blue Glove" on Union Street.

Through the exigencies of the times in which he lived, Pratt painted many such signs, and seems to have gained among his contemporaries more reputation for them than for his portraits. Perhaps not unjustly, since the latter, as may be seen in the portrait of Cadwallader Colden, Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of New York, 1761-1775, which

ROBERT EDGE PINE

...er part of the eighteenth century for ...ntic costumes. It was encouraged by ...picturesque arrangement.

...opolitan Museum of Art, New York

AFTER THE CONCLUSION OF PEACE

now hangs in the Chamber of Commerce, New York, are heavy in colour and laboriously dignified. They reproduce the worst features of West, with whom Pratt studied for two years and a half, being, indeed, his first American pupil. The occasion of his visit to London was to escort thither his relative, Miss Shewell, the long-affianced bride of West, to whom he "gave her away" at St. Martin's in the Strand. The sojourn in his master's studio is commemorated in The American School of the Metropolitan Museum, his most important work. The figure to the left, with the hat on, is West's, who is represented in the act of criticising one of Pratt's drawings, while the other students listen. With the exception of this visit to London, one to Ireland in 1770, and another to New York in 1772, Pratt's life was spent in Philadelphia, and there he died in 1805.

* * * * *

But, by all odds, the most famous resident American painter of the period, and the one most interesting to ourselves, is Charles Willson (or Wilson) Peale; for his life was remarkably characteristic of the time, and so intimately related to some of its most important events. Born at Chesterton, Maryland, in 1741, he displayed from his youth mechanical ability and remarkable versatility. In early life he proved himself a clever worker in leather, wood, and metal. He could make a harness, a clock, or silver moulding; he stuffed birds; extracted, repaired, and manufactured teeth, and delivered popular lectures. By degrees, discovering some skill in drawing, he first took lessons in Annapolis from the Swedish painter, Gustavus Hesselius, then studied under Copley in Boston, and finally with West in London. Upon his return to this country he lived for two years in Annapolis, and in 1772 painted the first life-size portrait of Washington, showing him in his aspect before the Revolution. Washington was at the time forty years old, and is represented as a Virginia colonel, in blue coat, scarlet facings, scarlet waistcoat and breeches, and a purple scarf over the left shoulder. It was the uniform in which he had served eighteen years before against the French and Indians near the headwaters of the Ohio, and in which a year later he had taken part in Braddock's disastrous expedition, where his coolness and bravery saved a remnant of the force.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

At the outbreak of the Revolution, Peale joined the army and commanded a company at the battles of Trenton and Germantown. In the intervals of fighting he worked upon his second portrait of Washington, which had been commissioned by Congress. The picture was begun during the gloomy winter of 1777-1778 at Valley Forge, and continued at Monmouth. Here Washington suggested introducing as a background the view from the window of the farmhouse in which he was at the time sitting for his portrait, and Peale painted in the Monmouth Courthouse with a body of Hessians issuing from it under guard. Later, when he finished the picture at Princeton, he added a view of Nassau Hall. In all he painted fourteen portraits of Washington, and it is upon these, although his work includes the portraits of many other famous men, that his reputation is chiefly based.

AFTER THE CONCLUSION OF PEACE

It is customary to speak of these portraits as being more interesting in the way of memorials than as works of art. Yet it may be doubted if this estimate is just, for Peale's portraits have an actuality as vivid as Copley's. He lacked, it is true, the latter's versatility, his elegance of suggestion, and facility in rendering sumptuous fabrics, because he was more concerned with virility of character in men than with the graces of femininity. He had even less feeling than Copley for the æsthetic qualities of painting, as in itself a source of emotional expression; for with him it was purely a means to an end. Yet within this narrow conception of art he was so single-minded and sincere that his pictures are extraordinarily convincing, and, if you view them for what they aimed to be, faithful records of objective facts, most stimulating and conclusive. They are the work of a man who in many respects was less than a painter, but in others very much more.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

He was active in the service of his country as in that of art. In addition to his military career, he had been a member of the Philadelphia Convention of 1777. Having discovered some mammoth bones, he commenced a collection of objects relating to the sciences and arts, which was the first step in the direction of a museum in this country. He also attempted to establish in Philadelphia a school of fine arts, and was successful in organising the first exhibition of paintings. Finally, in 1805, he co-operated in the foundation of the Pennsylvania Academy, the oldest of all our existing art institutions. For the New York Academy of Fine Arts, though founded four years earlier, had succumbed to straitened circumstances, and it was not until 1828 that the present National Academy of Design was launched upon its career. It is an interesting characteristic of the Pennsylvania Academy that, while its promoters included some painters, its management has always been in the hands of laymen. Its original object, as set forth in its parchment of incorporation, was:

“To promote the cultivation of the Fine Arts in the United States of America by introducing correct and elegant copies from works of the first masters in Sculpture and Painting, and by thus facilitating the access to such standards, and also by conferring moderate but honourable premiums, and otherwise assisting studies and exciting the efforts of artists, gradually to unfold, enlighten and invigorate the talents of our countrymen.”

C. W. PEALE

as imitation of the subject, bit by bit by method of suggestion of the whole as a unity of purpose.

of the New York Public Library

C. W. PEALE

Painting in the first place the beginning suit of Peale by himself at the age of
Academy of Fine Arts, Philadelphia

AFTER THE CONCLUSION OF PEACE

This quaintly expresses the high and stalwart purpose of the times; a consciousness of the limited conditions of the start, a conviction of the harvest of the future; and among the contemporary painters none was so representative of his time as Charles Wilson Peale.

On the other hand, the great exception to the otherwise limited conditions of the period was Gilbert Stuart; for his qualifications as a painter were not to be rivalled by any other American for nearly half a century. He was born in 1755, at Narragansett, where his father, a Scotch refugee, who had been mixed up in the troubles of the Pretender, owned a snuff-grinding mill on the Petaquamscott Pond. He had married a Welsh lady, from whom the son inherited a taste for music and skill in playing the organ. The boy, when quite young, had shown an inclination for drawing, in which he was encouraged by a local physician, Dr. William Hunter. In course of time a Scotch painter, Cosmo Alexander, paid a visit to Newport. He was attracted by the promise of talent in the youth, who was now eighteen, gave him some lessons, and invited his companionship in a journey back to Scotland, where he placed him in Glasgow University. Very shortly afterwards, however, Alexander died, and Stuart, friendless and homesick, found passage back to Newport on a collier. He continued to progress in his art, and was practising at Boston, when the first shots were fired at Lexington; whereupon, his family being of the Tory party, he made his way to New York and thence sailed for London. Not until all his funds were spent did he make application to West, who with characteristic kindness immediately befriended him, and, recognising his ability, took him into his own house and at length engaged him as an assistant. But, although he worked for eight years in West's studio, he was uninfluenced by the latter's point of view or method of painting.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Perhaps it was because of the Scotch and Welsh blood in his veins that he remained independent of all the tendencies around him and saw exclusively with his own eyes. In an age of considerable affectation, when public taste was largely moulded by the drama and the histrionic feeling was reflected in painting, his portraits were singularly devoid of any display. His aim was to get his sitters to reveal their natural selves, and to put them at their ease he exercised his remarkable gift as a raconteur, drawing freely from his store of anecdote and experience. It was the actual humanity of his subject, the individual character of the men or women before his easel, that enlisted his shrewd and sympathetic interest, and in defence of his frequent slurring over of the drapery parts of the picture he would say: "I copy the works of God, and leave clothes to the tailor and mantua-maker." Yet, if he felt the clothes to be characteristic of the personality and contributory to its expression, he would bestow upon them the most exact and loving care.

AFTER THE CONCLUSION OF PEACE

No better example of this could be desired than the Portrait of Dr. Fothergill in his drab quaker costume. This famous London physician, who had been born in Yorkshire and educated in Edinburgh, warmly sympathised with the American Colonies and had espoused their cause in a pamphlet entitled "Considerations Relative to the North American Colonies." He had associated himself very closely with Franklin, and the latter's comment on hearing of his death was, "I can hardly conceive that a better man ever existed." In full accord with the elevated refinement of the doctor's personality are the exquisite modelling of the face and hands and the delicate craftsmanship exhibited in the rendering of the wig and coat and accessories. This early example of Stuart is all the more precious because of the dissimilarity which it presents to his usual, more vigorous, and suggestive method. For what distinguishes him from the famous English portrait painters of his day is the entire absence of a parti pris in his work; he does not set out to make a picture, but to seize with certainty and directness the actuality of the person in front of him. In doing so, he was accustomed to concentrate the emphasis on some salient feature. This is particularly illustrated in his famous portrait of Washington, known as the Athenæum Portrait.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Stuart's admiration for Washington had grown into a passion. He was upon the flood tide of success; "tasked himself with six sitters a day," had painted portraits of George III., and of the Prince of Wales; his position in the fashionable world of London—and he himself was a bon vivant—was assured; yet he gave up all to return to America, impelled by his admiration of Washington and his desire to paint this man among men. He reached New York in 1792, and two years later arrived in Philadelphia, during the session of Congress, to present to Washington a letter of introduction from John Jay. Those were stirring times. The "Whisky Boys" were rioting against the tax on liquors; the nation was in commotion over the stoppage on the high seas of American merchantmen by British privateers, and everywhere clanged the opposing arguments of Federalists and anti-Federalists, of Republicans and Democrats. Amidst the tumult of passion and prejudice reared the strong, calm personality of Washington. In his presence Stuart, who had seen all manner of men from high to low without blinking, confesses that he lost his self-possession. The first attempt at a portrait was a failure; the artist rubbed it out; the anecdotes with which he had beguiled other on from life. The first he was in England. This one came nearest to that he might not have to part

INGTON

GILBERT STUART

Museum of Fine Arts, Boston

GILBERT STUART

representing this Quaker gentleman he has the wigs and clothes with a minute

Academy of Fine Arts, Philadelphia

AFTER THE CONCLUSION OF PEACE

men into revealing their inner selves were of no avail to unmask the impassive calm of Washington. A second picture was begun; Stuart had discovered that upon the experiences of the late war Washington would expand. He painted the portrait, which was presented to Lord Landsdown and is now in England. It is known as the Lansdown Portrait, a full length, with left hand on the sword-hilt and the other extended. Still later, at Mrs. Washington's request, the President gave another sitting, and in 1796 the Athenæum Portrait was produced. It came nearest to Stuart's conception of his subject, and he delayed to finish it, that he might not have to part with it. After his death it was sold by his widow, and presented to the Athenæum, Boston. It now hangs in the Museum of Fine Arts in that city. These three, the first of which was destroyed by the artist, were the only portraits of Washington that Stuart made from life. The numerous others are either replicas of these or imaginary portraits, such as the Washington on Dorchester Heights.

While Peale's first portrait of Washington represents him in his prime, the Athenæum shows him in the evening of life, when the stress of day had been succeeded by ample calm. It illustrates also Stuart's faculty for seizing on the vital, salient features of the subject. "There were," he himself said, "features in Washington's face totally different from what I have observed in any other human being; the sockets of the eyes, for instance, were larger than I ever met with before, and the upper part of the nose broader. All his features were indicative of strong passion, yet, like Socrates, his judgment and great self-command made him appear a man of different class in the eyes of the world."

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

The colour of Washington's eyes was a light, greyish blue, but, according to Mr. Custis, Stuart painted them of a deeper blue, saying: "In a hundred years they will have faded to the right colour." The immobility of the mouth is due to the loss of teeth and to the ill-fitting substitutes constructed by Wilson Peale.

In 1794 Stuart settled in Boston, where he continued to reside until his death in 1828. His career stands out in the early chapter of American painting as a single unrelated episode. He was the only American of his day who was in the true sense a painter. Beside him Peale and even Copley are still limners, enclosing figures in hard outlines and laying on the colours with tight and rigid primness, so that, as we have remarked, there is little or no difference in texture between the flesh parts and the fabrics, no suggestion of the figures being enveloped in atmosphere or illumined with natural light, very little also of living movement in gestures and poses. Their work, as compared with Stuart's, betrays the feeling of the draughtsman, who secures first the exact form of his objects and then increases their semblance to reality by overlaying colour. Stuart's, on the other hand, has its origin in brushwork, guided by a painter's way of seeing his subject as an arrangement of coloured masses, variously affected by light and atmosphere. Consequently his outlines are varied—defined, indefinite, firm, or fluent, as they appear in life; the flesh, solid and yet supple, glows with light, its texture clearly differentiated from the other textures in the picture; the expression of the faces is animated with life, and the figures are easy and elastic in their poses. Moreover, while Peale and Copley elaborately recorded as far as they could all that was presented to the eye, Stuart summarised his impressions in a forceful generalisation.

AFTER THE CONCLUSION OF PEACE

He was unrelated to the conditions that preceded and clustered round 1784, and differed in the character of his achievement from any contemporaries either in America or England. For, when Stuart arrived in London he was only twenty years old, too young to have been permanently affected by the lack of opportunity in his native country, and, perhaps because of that blend of Scotch and Welsh blood in his veins, too independent to be directly influenced by West or anybody else. He looked upon life with his own eyes, and discovered for himself a way of seeing and representing what he saw. The sum of his work is uneven in quality, but at its best it anticipated the brilliant suggestiveness of modern brushwork.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

For this very reason one may possibly feel that his portraits have less of the flavour of the period than those of Peale and Copley and his other American contemporaries. In the light of our present study, which is not to drag the beginnings of American painting into remorseless comparison with the finer achievements of our modern painters, but to put them back in imagination into the scenes and conditions of which they were a part, Stuart's share in the story may seem an anachronism. It was admiration of Washington personally that drew him back to this country, not a zeal for republican ideas, in the furtherance of which he had borne no part. He did not share in the life-spirit of the nation, and it may be suspected that his portraits are more than a little tintured with an elegant cosmopolitanism. On the other hand, before the grimly intellectual or austere visionaries of Smibert's New England divines, the precise elegance and proud self-sufficiency of Copley's men and women of the world, or Peale's bald masculine records of the man upon whom devolved the leadership of a new nation, we can recognise a series of types and in our imagination reconstruct their environment. The very limitations of the painters possess a value of human and historical interest. We may transport ourselves beyond the then present, as the founders of the nation did, "and feel the future in the instant."

AFTER THE CONCLUSION OF PEACE

CHAPTER III

THE GROWTH OF THE NATIONAL SPIRIT

WHILE the struggle for independence was proceeding it had little or no effect upon the story of American painting. Its influence became apparent later in the resultant growth of national consciousness, and it is this phase of the story that occupies our present study. Again we will select a date as a vantage point from which to obtain a survey; and, as in the previous chapters we adopted that of 1783, when the first peace with Great Britain was confirmed, so now it shall be the conclusion of peace in 1815, after the second War of Independence.

There are two good reasons for the choice. In the thirty-one years which had elapsed, the idea of Independence had been fully realised, especially during the three years of the later struggle, when the succession of victories by sea and land reinforced the patriotism of the people with a new sense of national confidence. Moreover, out of the latter developed two new phases of independence: the one industrial, which was born immediately; the other, to appear some twenty years later, in its character spiritual or intellectual.

GROWTH OF THE NATIONAL SPIRIT

The second war was scarcely over before the need of industrial independence was felt. Already, while hostilities were proceeding and the cotton of the South was debarred from exportation to Liverpool, and the cotton and woollen goods of England from importation to this country, mills for the manufacture of cotton and woollen goods had been started in New England. These, upon the conclusion of peace, when the markets were glutted with foreign importations, found themselves threatened with extinction. The manufacturers immediately demanded protection, and in the following year obtained from Congress an act establishing a tariff. It was the beginning of a new idea, that political independence involved the need of industrial independence. Nor was it long before the idea of economic independence, originating in the necessities of the moment, discovered its relation to the spiritual and intellectual aspirations of the new nation. In 1837, before the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Cambridge, Emerson delivered that address entitled, "The American Scholar," which was hailed by Oliver Wendell Holmes as "Our Intellectual Declaration of Independence." In it Emerson sounded a new note. "Our day of dependence," he said, "our long apprenticeship to the learning of other lands, draws to a close. The millions that around us are rushing into life cannot always be fed on the sere remains of foreign harvests. Events, actions arise, that must be sung, that will sing themselves."

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

The utterance represents a singular combination of fallacy and truth. For in the kingdom of thought, wherein Emerson himself dwells and of which painting is a province, there are no boundaries of oceans or continents, no disabilities of dependence or alienship, but a community of free intercourse. Before another generation had passed away Americans would realise the need of this and begin to take full advantage of it. Meanwhile, in their pertinence to the conditions of the time in which they were spoken, those were true words.

For, by the wars with England and the restoration of the monarchy in France, this country was isolated. Moreover, the problems before it, political, industrial, and educational, were peculiar to itself and to be wrought out only by self-reliance. So this utterance had all the power of an exhortation and all the encouragement of a prophecy. For the time being, too, its application to painting rang true; for the feet of the painters of this period were turned toward Rome, and the decadent art of Italy, whence certainly was to be derived no source of strength for our infant art.

This new spirit of intellectual and spiritual independence and that other of economic independence, accompanied by so marvellous a territorial expansion, were reflected, as we shall see, in the growth of an American school of landscape painting. Meanwhile, before considering it, we must look back from our vantage point and attach the new phase of our story to the preceding one. The connecting link is John Trumbull.

GROWTH OF THE NATIONAL SPIRIT

* * * * *

Born in 1756, in Lebanon, Connecticut, a son of the Colonial Governor of that State, he was twenty years old when the Declaration of Independence was signed. A graduate of Harvard University, he had been influenced by the portraits of Smibert and Copley, and was already learning to become a painter when the War of the Revolution began. Immediately he joined the army, and, his skill in drawing being noted by Washington, he was set to making plans of the enemy's works. From this he was promoted to a position upon the general staff, with the rank of brigadier-major, and subsequently served as colonel under Gates. But aggrieved at the date which Congress assigned to his commission, he resigned from the army, made his way to France, whence he proceeded to England, and under West recommenced the study of painting. The execution of Major André, however, had aroused in England a spirit of retaliation, and Trumbull was arrested and imprisoned as a spy. The intercession of West saved his life, and after eight months' imprisonment secured his release, on condition that he leave the country. When peace was established, however, he went again to England and continued his studies with West, not returning to the United States until 1789.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

It must be admitted that his qualifications as a painter were not commensurate with the scope of his ideals. Moreover, he approached his subject from the patriot's rather than the painter's point of view. He was filled with the seriousness of his time, with the sense of responsibility to the grave issues through which the young nation was progressing, moreover, with that self-consciousness of the part which it behooved a patriot to play. His nearness to the great events made it impossible for him to view them apart from their political significance and to regard them, as a painter should, principally as an opportunity for a painter-like presentation. Further, the very temper of the time was antagonistic to any other view than the immense importance of the facts as facts, and nothing he could have learned from West tended to modify this unpainter-like point of view. For upon the point of view from which a painter approaches the subject of a historical painting, hinges the whole matter.

It may appear to some a hard saying that painting is a vehicle of doubtful suitability for the commemoration of great historical events, such as the

JOHN TRUMBULL

It was painted not from life, but from

Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York

GROWTH OF THE NATIONAL SPIRIT

Battles of Bunker Hill and Trenton, which among others Trumbull essayed to picture; still more hard, that patriotism, so far from being a stimulus to the painter in his art, may be a cause of weakness. But look at the illustration here reproduced of Trumbull's picture of the Battle of Bunker Hill, and ask yourself if the effect it produces upon your imagination is in any way comparable to, say, that of Longfellow's poem, "Paul Revere's Ride." If it is not, what is the reason?

We have already noted one reason, in the painter's preoccupation with accuracy of facts, so that the spirit of the occasion is ungrasped. There is another; that the poet had the advantage because his medium was words, by the sound and rhythm of which, as well as by their meaning, he could present picture after picture to our imagination, kindling it more and more by each successive appeal to our emotions, until we seem to hear the very clang of the horse's hoof, its laboured panting, and the heavy breathing of its rider; see the startled faces appearing at the windows, as each quiet village is awoke, and feel the torrent of patriotic ardour that swept through the country-side on that fateful night. It is conceivable that a painter might paint a picture of this incident which should move us as much as the poem does. But recognise at the outset the odds against him. Instead of the impetuous variety of words and tramp and rhythm of the lines, he must fix on some one action of horse and rider; instead of villages flying past, some one set scene for a background; instead of a gradual working up of fervour to a point of culmination, some one fixed, first and final, display. If he does, after all, succeed in awakening our emotions, it will not be through his restricted array of facts so much as through some suggestion to the imagination, by means of the impressiveness of the picture's composition and of its colour and light and shade. In a word, not by accuracy of detail or emulating the artifices of the stage manager, but because of the painter's reliance upon those qualities which are peculiar to his own craft.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

That the first requisite of a picture should be to have pictorial qualities, that is to say, that it should embody a subject which can be more vitally expressed in paint than in any other medium, and should be so treated as to bring out to its full possibilities the craft of the painter, would never have occurred to Trumbull, any more than it did to West, or, for that matter, to Reynolds. The latter, fortunately for his subsequent reputation, was held by his public almost exclusively to portraits, otherwise he would have squandered his talent, as more than once he did, over ambitious canvases based on mythological, historical, or religious themes. For the eighteenth century in England was characterised by the growth of English prose, culminating in enthusiasm for oratory and stage representations. It was a period of triumph for the written and spoken word, especially for the latter, and the ambition of the painter was to emulate this triumph in his pictures. Similar conditions prevailed in this country, and even in a heightened form, owing to the stimulus of national events. Consider the hold which the phraseology of the Declaration of Independence still has upon the imagination, and how much more powerfully it must have possessed those who had witnessed the realisation of its principles. Its phrases, familiar and oft repeated, gave an impetus to the worship of the written and spoken word that has continued to our own day, and it is a fact to be noted that the first genuine art expression of the new nation was not in the form of painting or sculpture, but of literature and oratory.

GROWTH OF THE NATIONAL SPIRIT

That Trumbull recognised the power of the word is illustrated amusingly in one of his letters. It was addressed to his agent in Washington, through whom he was expecting to make sales of the engravings of his pictures. Apparently, the results were not satisfactory, for he urges his correspondent to go about among the Senators and Congressmen, and talk, talk, talk. "You must remember," he adds, "that we are living under a logocracy." *

* Word-government, or government of the word.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

His attitude toward painting may be gathered from another of his letters:

"I am fully sensible," he wrote, "that the profession [of painting], as it is generally practised, is frivolous, little useful to society, and unworthy a man who has talents for more serious pursuits. But to preserve and diffuse the memory of the noblest series of actions which have ever presented themselves in the history of man, is sufficient warrant for it."

Thus, his highest conception of a painter was to be a historian in paint; and his pictures illustrate it.

* * * * *

Very different from this practical man of affairs who practised painting, was his contemporary, Washington Allston. The latter in one of his letters describes his sensations in presence of the works of the Venetian colourists, Titian, Paul Veronese, and Tintoretto. He tells how the magic of the colouring affected him irrespective of the subjects; that he recognised in it an abstract language, comparable to that of music. In a word, he acknowledged the independence of painting as a medium of expression; and, idealist, dreamer, romanticist, that he was by nature, had most of the qualifications that distinguished the great romantic painter, Delacroix. But he lacked the capacity of the latter to keep himself detached from the

WASHINGTON ALLSTON

*... sentimental aloofness from any reality
... painted.
... Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York*

WASHINGTON ALLSTON

stir-scientific lines, therefore lacking in the record of an actual scene.

Academy of Fine Arts, Philadelphia

GROWTH OF THE NATIONAL SPIRIT

literary alliance, while yet drawing from literature his inspiration. It was the tragedy of Allston's life that he was subservient to the dominion of the word; moreover, he was a man of frail physique, whose ideas outstripped his strength.

An exception to the rule that the South, while patronising art, did not produce artists, he was of good Southern family, born at Waccamaw, South Carolina, in 1779. At seven years old, in consequence of the frailty of his constitution, he was sent to the more bracing climate of Newport, Rhode Island, where his school days were passed in the companionship of Edward S. Malbone. The latter, a native of Newport, two years his senior, had early displayed that skill in drawing which resulted in his becoming an excellent miniature painter, and his example confirmed the young Allston's own taste for drawing. Also there was much in the latter's gentle nature, with its love for the marvellous and the poetic, that fitted in with the refined abstraction of Malbone's disposition. The result was an ardent friendship between them, that continued while Allston was studying at Harvard and the older youth was working as a portrait painter in Boston. His college days over, Allston returned to South Carolina and found Malbone successfully engaged in Charleston, and the two planned a visit to England; Allston, with characteristic imprudence, disposing of his share in the family estate for a small sum of ready cash. They were together in London for a few months, and there Malbone painted The Hours, three girl figures representing the Past, Present, and Future, circling in a dance, which is regarded as his most important work. Then the companionship ended, for Malbone returned home, and six years later, after a vain attempt to restore his shattered health by a voyage to Jamaica, died at Savannah in 1807.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

During four years' sojourn in Rome, where, in companionship with Vanderlyn, Allston enjoyed the intimacy of many famous men, among others of Keats, Shelley, Byron, Hans Anderson, Washington Irving, and Turner, he came under the spell of Raphael, "the greatest master," as he put it, "of the affections in our art," and of Michelangelo, "of whom I know not how to speak in adequate terms of reverence—even Raphael bows before him." The grace of the one may well have been dangerously seductive; the terrific power of the other, engulfing to a young man whose instruction in the actual rudiments of his art had been so limited, and whose mind was already apt to be overoccupied with reverie and contemplation. One result of his Italian experience, therefore, was to direct his thoughts to conceptions beyond his ability and strength to body forth, many of them more adapted to poetic than to pictorial expression. He left numerous drawings of studies for

JOHN VANDERLYN

Museum of Art, New York

[illegible]

GROWTH OF THE NATIONAL SPIRIT

his pictures, in which the æsthetic intention shines forth spontaneously and clearly, whereas in the finished work it became laboured over and obscured. Thus in the Dead Man Restored to Life (by touching Elijah's bones as he was being buried), notwithstanding the general handsomeness of the composition, there is evidence of a laboured piecing together of its several parts, so that the total effect is rather one of pose and artifice, reminiscent of the mechanics of the Italian "grand style," but without that comprehending grasp which welds all into an appearance of having grown into being, spontaneously and inevitably.

Allston married a sister of the celebrated divine, Dr. Channing, and settled in Cambridge, Massachusetts, where he lived a life of very beautiful seclusion in the society of a few choice friends. Twenty-six years before his death he had made what he called "a highly finished sketch" of a very large picture, Belshazzar's Feast. He had been still working over the unfinished canvas on the day that he died, in 1843. It remained a pathetic memorial to the magnitude of his ideals and the insufficiency of his personal accomplishment.

* * * * *

To this early period of the Republic belongs another notable name, associated also with promise only partially realised, that of John Vanderlyn. Though he painted many excellent portraits, his fame rests chiefly on two pictures, Marius Among the Ruins of Carthage, and the nude figure of Ariadne. Born in Kingston, New York, in 1776, he worked as a boy with a local blacksmith. His brother was established in New York as a physician, and through his influence and that of Aaron Burr Vanderlyn studied under Stuart, and then, with his patron's help, paid a visit to Paris. He revisited that city in 1803, when he became intimate with Allston, the two friends later, as we have seen, living together in Rome. It was there that he painted the two pictures mentioned above. The Marius was shown at the Paris Salon of 1808, where it attracted the notice of Napoleon, who personally selected it for one of his gold medals. The Ariadne is in the old-fashioned style of painting of that period, being neither a study of life such as we are accustomed to to-day nor invested with that quality of abstract beauty that characterises the work of the Italian masters, on which it was modelled. It is, however, a picture of considerable distinction, both in drawing and colour.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Though an early work, it was nevertheless the last of Vanderlyn's notable achievements. Whether it were a fact that he was an instance, and there are many in painting, of quickly reached maturity as quickly exhausted, or that the times in America were not yet ripe for works of imagination, or that the slowness with which he painted interfered with his popularity as a portrait painter, certain it is that Vanderlyn became an unsuccessful and disappointed man. One day, in 1852, he reappeared at Kingston and borrowed a shilling of a friend to pay for the transportation of his baggage to the hotel. Arrived there, he retired to his room, and the following morning was found dead. The brief vitalising influence of his career, as of Allston's, had been the "grand style" of Italian art. In Vanderlyn's unfulfilled promise, in Allston's later years as he sat in front of his never-to-be-finished picture, impotently trying to re-enact the miracle of the dead restored to life, and to make the present live by contact with the dead bones of the past, there is a deep pathos. Both looked backward, while all the energy of their countrymen and of their time was bent in a direction forward. They were also by instinct cosmopolitan and aloof from the spirit of independent nationalism, which had become the guiding influence of their contemporaries. Meanwhile this spirit, encouraged by Emerson, had inspired a group of painters, who are remembered as the "Hudson River School."

GROWTH OF THE NATIONAL SPIRIT

CHAPTER IV

A NATIVE GROWTH OF LANDSCAPE PAINTING

THE most direct outcome of the development of a national spirit was the appearance of the so-called "Hudson River School." It was a title given to a group of landscape painters who began by working in the neighbourhood of the Hudson. It is customary to speak of these men disparagingly because they did not paint as well as the majority of modern painters. They should, however, be honoured, despite their technical deficiencies, for the motive and manner of their inspiration.

In the first place, they went to nature for their motive, and, secondly, they studied it in that love and pride of American conditions which, outside of painting, characterised their age. They were the first of American painters to give expression to the prevailing spirit of nationalism.

* * * * *

While the earliest of these landscape painters was Thomas Doughty, the one who gave the impetus to the new movement and helped most to make it popular was Thomas Cole. In a sense also

THE EXPULSION FROM PARADISE

THOMAS COLE

FROM the unaffected study of nature, pure and simple, Cole passed to extravagant conceits such as this. The reproduction betters the original, since it does not betray the latter's faded color and tame, niggling brushwork. From the standpoint of modern imagination and modern technique the picture represents "much cry and little wool."

In the Lenox Collection of the New York Public Library

[illegible]

GROWTH OF LANDSCAPE PAINTING

he was a link between the new enthusiasm for nature-study and the older predilection for historical and "grand style" subjects, since in those pictures which his contemporaries particularly applauded—Expulsion from Paradise, and the two series respectively called The Course of Empire and The Voyage of Life—he was not satisfied to depict nature for its own sake, but made it the vehicle for moral allegories. The public recognised in them what it had already appreciated in Bryant's "Thanatopsis"—the introduction of nature as a setting for elevated sentiments. But Cole's more enduring claim to be remembered consists in his having aroused an appreciation of the pictorial possibilities of the Catskills, and of American landscape in general.

He was born in England in 1801, and when nineteen years old accompanied his family to this country, his father, a wallpaper-maker, settling in Steubenville, Ohio. But the son was of a wandering disposition, and his roamings led him farther and farther afield, until at length he reached Philadelphia, and in the Academy had the first chance of studying pictures. Meanwhile it was nature that prompted his own desire to paint, and when he finally arrived in New York it was with a number of studies made in the Catskills and along the Hudson. These came to the notice of Trumbull and Durand, who saw in them the beginnings of a new development of native art. They were exhibited; Bryant among others praised them; some found purchasers, and Cole's successful career was started. He made visits to England, France, and Italy, and his pictures appeared in the Royal Academy. But, though he made his permanent home near the village of Catskill, close to some of the most beautiful scenery of what he called his "dear Catskills," his love of nature, pure and simple, became confused with other motives. Possessing a religious and romantic temperament, a student of Bunyan and Sir Walter Scott, he yielded to the stronger influences of the time, which, as we have seen, were literary, didactic, and oratorical, rather than pictorial. In The Expulsion from Paradise, for example, we miss the note of nature-study; the landscape has been compiled; while in Destruction, number four of his Course of Empire, he has emulated the artifices by which Claude built up his imaginary scenes of classic grandeur; only, unlike the Frenchman, whose artistic instinct kept him to the sole motive of a beautiful picture in which the figures count simply as spots of animation, Cole, with no skill of figure-drawing, has made these puppets the main actors in the great spectacle. The total effect is in consequence bombastic and the details pitifully weak.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

* * * * *

Yet, as we have seen, he was not the first American landscape painter. This title belongs to Thomas Doughty (1793-1856), who had been painting from nature for five years before Cole's appearance in New York. His work, like that of Asher B. Durand (1796-1886) and J. F. Kensett (1818-1872), breathes the true spirit of what the French call the paysage intime, that love of the simple country-side, of nature for its own sake, which characterises the pictures of the Barbizon School and of their forerunner, Constable. These paintings of the Hudson Valley had in them the true stuff that has made landscape painting the sincerest form of modern expression; what they lacked was skill in the craftsmanship of painting and the painter's point of view. These men looked on nature with an eye at once too niggling and too comprehensive.

GROWTH OF LANDSCAPE PAINTING

In the first place, for example, the landscape by Durand, reproduced here, is too big in size and too extensive in subject to be embraced by a single vision. The eye wanders over it, as it would in presence of the original scene, receiving a number of enjoyable impressions, but no impression of unity and completeness. Lacking these qualities, which are the result of selection, simplification, and organic arrangement, the subject is not so much pictorial as panoramic and topographical. It represents the ordinary way of looking at a landscape rather than the artist's way. In the second place, there is an absence of synthesis, that is to say, of a summarising of essentials, in the actual representation of the details. A uniformly patient and conscientious putting together of little effects is spread like a network over the whole; the painter has not grasped the salient characteristics of the whole or its parts, has not enforced these and subordinated the rest. The result is, that his trees and mountains do not assert themselves as masses, but invite attention to the infinite, niggling strokes of which they are composed,* and this is partly the cause and partly the effect of the way in which the brush was handled.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

In some parts it has spread a thin tint over the canvas, in others worked like a pencil point; nowhere with the breadth and fulness and firmness that distinguish the methods of the real painter. We recall the fact that Durand, until his thirty-ninth year, was only an engraver, a very skilful one, and it is the engraver's rather than the painter's feeling which is evident throughout the canvas. Kensett also began life as an engraver, and his landscapes equally betray the fact. But the previous occupation of these men was not the only

* This lack of synthesis is much less apparent in the small reproduction than in the larger original, because the photograph and the subsequent half-tone process of reproducing it have tended to compress the details into masses of tone, and have, in a way, effected a synthesis.

ON THE HUDSON

THOMAS DOUGHTY

A LANDSCAPE of the "Hudson River School," showing in the distance the hills of West Point. Notwithstanding that the trees in the foreground are not of nature's coloring, but of the conventional brown, and that they are painted with a needle-pointed preciseness, the beautiful scene is so patiently transcribed that the picture has much charm.

In the Collection of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York

The image shows a document page that is severely degraded. On the left side, there is a large, dark, irregular shape that appears to be a binding or a large stain. The rest of the page is covered in heavy noise and artifacts, making the text almost entirely illegible. There are some faint, dark shapes that might be remnants of text or graphics, but they cannot be accurately transcribed or described.

GROWTH OF LANDSCAPE PAINTING

reason for this lack of painter-like quality in their work. With the sole exception of Stuart, no painter in the true sense of the term had appeared in America. It was not until later, when Americans came in touch with the Barbizon men and learned from them how to look at nature, how to select from it and compose the essentials into a picture, and how to paint with a full, firm brush in masses, that landscape painting, as distinct from mere representation of landscape, commenced in this country.

Meanwhile it is very cheap criticism to decry these men of the Hudson River School for their lack of technical ability. Rather should they be remembered as the leaders among us in that return to nature which, unknown to them, had also led Rousseau and his followers to Barbizon, and was to become in literature and painting the strong, distinctive characteristic of the nineteenth century. Nor should it be overlooked how closely in our own country the movement was related to the general trend of thought and action. While Cole with his palette and brushes retraversed the ground that Washington Irving had made famous with his pen, and his landscapes embodied the elevated sentiment of Bryant's poetry and the mystery and vastness of Cooper's descriptions of nature, the work of all these painters reflected and contributed to the love and pride of their own country which was filling high with hope and certainty the heart of the nation.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

It should be noted that the careers of these men of the Hudson River School lasted far on into the century. Accordingly, we may as well shake ourselves free from the shackles of chronology for a little while, and complete this portion of our story.

The simple study of nature, begun by Doughty, Durand, and Kensett, was carried on by the two brothers, William and James McDougal Hart. Both were born in Scotland, the former in 1823, the latter in 1828, and were brought to this country in 1831, their family settling in Albany. Here, as they grew up, they were apprenticed to a coach-maker, and gained their first experience as painters in decorating carriages. William Hart by self-instruction graduated from carriage panels to canvases, working first on portraits, later on landscapes. He passed on his experience to his younger brother, who also studied under Schirmer at Düsseldorf.

This was in 1851, the year in which Leutze returned to America, after studying in the same school; and Hart may have been influenced by him to go thither, as certainly other students were. Indeed, for a short time during the middle of the century Düsseldorf represented to American students the goal of their desires, just as Paris does to-day; and the fact was not without influence upon our painting. For Schirmer himself was a tame and sentimental painter, and the whole tendency of the school was toward a trivial exactitude of method and a banality of motive; both seen most characteristically in the sentimental genre pictures of lovely and virtuous peasantry. A great many such pictures found their way to America, and, of course, because of their representing a little anecdote or story, were popular with a public that was still very much under the dominion of the Word and not yet trained to an appreciation of a painting as a painting. So, indirectly on public taste, and directly on a considerable number of painters, the influence of the Düsseldorf school was unfortunate.

GROWTH OF LANDSCAPE PAINTING

Hart, however, lived it down, gaining with experience more freedom of brushwork and developing a charming resourcefulness in colour. Nor was he touched by the sentimentality of the school. His landscapes, like his brother's and those of the other painters of the Hudson River School, represent as frank and sincere a delight in the lovable aspects of nature as one can imagine. It is, however, a purely objective one; and this fact, I think, is very interesting. It is not until later, when our painters shall have come under the influence of the Barbizon group, that they will begin to concern themselves with the moods of nature, the reflection in the latter of their own moods. This consciousness of self and need of self-expression represent an older, if not necessarily a maturer, habit of mind—a product of the effort everywhere to realise and emphasise the individual. But, as yet, our early painters had not begun to think of themselves as individuals; like the rest of the community, they were engaged for the present in building up a nation; it was the spirit of nationality that fired them and found its natural expression in love of country and in love of nature as its embodiment. So their attitude toward it was that of the child, frankly delighting in the beauty of the thing spread out before their eyes.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

By degrees, as the country was opened up and the wonders of the Rocky Mountains were unfolded, the painter's imagination, like that of his fellows, became stimulated and his ideal expanded. He turned from the simple surroundings of the homestead to the miracles of nature, and began to be affected by the prevailing enthusiasm for "the biggest thing on earth." It was the grandest and most tremendously impressive manifestations of nature, demanding large canvases, which now attracted such men as F. E. Church, Thomas Moran, and Albert Bierstadt; and, a thing to be noted, this preoccupation with the grandiose, which had begun in an awakened pride of country, led to the pursuit of bigness for its own sake. Church sought his subjects from South America to Lab-

SCENE AT NAPONACH

WILLIAM HART

THE work of a carriage-painter, who taught himself to paint pictures and then studied for three years in Scotland, this landscape is a good example of the "Hudson River School." It exhibits on the painter's part a genuine love of nature and a determination to imitate nature as closely as possible. But the imitation is of details, put together bit by bit. This lack of synthesis, itself resulting from the lack of a large, embracing comprehension of the whole, produces an effect of pettiness, notwithstanding the handiwork of the composition. This impression is enforced if one compare the picture with Inness's landscape "Midsummer".

In the Collection of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York

[illegible]

02
03
04

[illegible]

GROWTH OF LANDSCAPE PAINTING

rador; Bierstadt and Thomas Moran in the Rocky Mountains. But how thoroughly these men belonged to their age is proved by the enthusiasm which their work aroused in the public.

Bierstadt, of German origin and with a German's passion for the romantic, had the faculty of possessing himself with the spirit of the scene. Moreover, although his method of painting was hard and sleek—owing to his Düsseldorf training—his draughtsmanship was excellent. One may see in the accompanying illustration of Yosemite Valley what a power he had of representing the constructive force of mountain masses, and of suggesting perspective. A thing, however, to be observed, as affecting the dignity of the picture, is that its size is comparatively small. The painter concentrated his effort, and concentration on the part of the spectator is also possible, whereas over a very large landscape-canvas there is a corresponding lessening, by dispersion, both of effort and effect.

Yet even this picture, though unquestionably it may give us a sense of nature's impressiveness, does not conclusively impress us. We are not made to realise the emotions which the painter must have felt and we ourselves should feel in presence of the actual scene. We are conscious of no condition of feeling but one of purely intellectual comprehension; we are pretty well assured what the scene looks like, but not what it feels like. It is almost exclusively a view.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Apart from questions of technical skill, this is the sharp line of difference between the earlier landscapes and those of the present day, in which we shall find the expression of a mood in nature to be the painter's aim. It is a difference of point of view and motive. The mental attitude of Bierstadt, Church, and Moran still remained like that of Trumbull, and their landscapes might be styled, without straining the word, "historical."

COTOPAXI

FREDERICK E. CHURCH

IN the sky effects, even more in the composition of the middle distance and foreground, there are instances of the influence of Turner. But the big feeling of the latter is wanting. The eye has comprehended a big subject, but scarcely in a big way.

In the Lenox Collection of the New York Public Library

CHAPTER V

REMNANTS OF THE ENGLISH INFLUENCE

IN the previous chapter we saw how the development of national consciousness found expression in a native growth of landscape painting. We noted that, while the beginnings of the "Hudson River School" were inspired by a simple love of nature, its followers gradually developed an enthusiasm for the grandiose and spectacular; and, moreover, that from first to last the work of these painters was technically insufficient. It will be the topic of the following chapters to show how the technical resources of American painting were fertilised by foreign influence.

For Emerson's doctrine, that "our long apprenticeship to the learning of other lands draws to a close," had been put to the test and found wanting. It could arouse a motive, and a good one; but not provide the means to realise it adequately. The fallacy of the doctrine consists in this—that it took account only of the subject matter of an artist's work. He felt, and rightly, too, that there should be enough in the accomplishments and aspirations of the American nation to supply all the needed suggestion of ideas. But for a work of art something more is necessary than ideas; of even more importance is the form in which they are expressed. For it is the form in which the poetic idea, or the musical harmony, or the pictorial representation is embodied, that gives each its particular qualification to be reckoned as a work of art. The building must be erected before it can be used for the purpose for which it is intended. Similarly, technique is the necessary structural antecedent to the expression of an idea through a work of art.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Of technical knowledge all that survived in America in the middle of the century was a remnant of the English tradition. It was insufficient for real progress, as the few men who went abroad at the middle of the century discovered. They found new forces in fermentation, and straightway began to assimilate them. Indeed, a convenient way to study the modern development of the story of American painting is to recognise the fermentation which occurred in European art during the past century and to trace how American painting gradually aligned itself with the foreign movement. So far from its being a story of self-sufficient isolation, it has come to be one of complete identification with the strivings of other countries. For, to-day, so far as concerns technical considerations, painting is an international art with a free trade in methods, the clearing-house of which has been Paris.

REMNANTS OF ENGLISH INFLUENCE

Before, however, the latter became generally recognised as the metropolitan centre of art instruction, a few Americans travelled to Düsseldorf and Munich. Therefore the telling of the story demands an allusion to the remnant of the English tradition and to the influence of these other schools, as preparation for the concluding and decisive influence of Paris.

The English influence had never been completely dissolved, notwithstanding the tension of political feeling, which perhaps had somewhat abated, though it was to be tightened again during the period of the Civil War. Our painters were welcomed in England; and English painters, coming over here, were well received. Thus, until the middle of the century, the English tradition still lingered on, especially affecting portraiture and genre painting.

But even in England the great day of portrait painting was past. It had reached its meridian in Gainsborough and Reynolds and in the Scotchman, Raeburn, who in the pure force of painting was often their superior. It had declined through the tender sweetness of Romney and Hoppner, until it reached a sunset of superficial splendour in Lawrence. The latter's facile skill and exuberant inventiveness delayed the catastrophe, while at the same time it helped to make it inevitable and complete. The study of nature had yielded to sentimentality, that of men and women to an extravagant interest in their clothes, the original vigour of the motive was undermined, and it needed only less skilful practitioners to reduce the art to a mere representation of insipid prettiness or of middle-class banality.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

During the second quarter of the nineteenth century portraiture in America, as in England, exhibited hard polished surfaces of colour, a dry regard for details, and little discernment between the textures of flesh and fabrics. Still, to so sweeping a summary there are some exceptions, among which, for our present purpose of studying conditions rather than men, we may mention four—Thomas Sully, Henry Inman, Chester Harding, and Charles Loring Elliott.

* * * * *

The life of Sully covers the extended period of eighty-nine years, and would be memorable if only for its enormous productivity. He was born at Horncastle, Lincolnshire, England, in 1783, his father and mother being popular figures on the English stage. When the son was nine years old they accepted an engagement to settle in Charleston, South Carolina, where in time the boy received instruction from his brother-in-law, M. Belzons, a miniature painter. After painting in Richmond and Norfolk he moved to New York, and thence to Boston, where for a few months he studied under Gilbert Stuart. In 1809 he went to London and painted for a little while with West; but from the evidence of his work it is probable that the painter in London who chiefly interested him was Lawrence.

REMNANTS OF ENGLISH INFLUENCE

His style, indeed, represents a mixture, considerably diluted with himself, of Lawrence and Stuart. It exhibits the latter's purity of fresh tones and the other's tricks of giving the sitter an expression of pleasant prettiness; but misses alike the virility of Stuart's and Lawrence's decorative elegance. From 1810 to his death in 1872 he lived in Philadelphia.

* * * * *

Henry Inman was a far stronger painter than Sully, and one whose work hardly receives to-day the recognition that it deserves. No doubt, it was uneven in quality; but some of his portraits of men are remarkably strong in characterisation. That, for example, of Chief Justice Marshall, owned by the Law Association of Philadelphia, is one of those sterling achievements in the presence of which one loses the idea of paint and is conscious only of the living, forceful personality. Yet, if one examines the method of painting, there is no disappointment. It is painstaking without being laboured or fumbling; very solid and conscientious.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

It lacks Stuart's free-handed happiness of touch that hits off expression as if by improvisation, yet Stuart never painted anything more alive than this.

Inman was born at Utica, New York, in 1803. He became in time a pupil of that eccentric painter, John Wesley Jarvis, an Englishman by birth, who was as much a glutton for work as he was for the delights and weaknesses of the flesh. Inman was elected the first vice-president of the National Academy, and enjoyed unusual success both in Philadelphia and New York. But he was a victim of asthma, and frailty of health reduced his capacity for productiveness. Some friends, among whom was James Lenox, the founder of the Lenox Library and its collection of pictures, arranged for him to visit England to paint the portrait of Wordsworth and other famous men. His visit was altogether a happy episode; the asthma for the time being ceased to trouble him; he made many friends; his portraits were appreciated, and he was urged to settle in England. He returned, however, to America; but a few months later, in 1846, died of heart disease.

* * * * *

The vicissitudes of Chester Harding's early life present an interesting reflection of the state of the times. He was born at Conway, Massachusetts, in 1792; but when he was fourteen years old the family moved into Western New York. He was

THOMAS SULLY

Charles Robert Leslie, R. A.
Academy of Fine Arts, Philadelphia

CHESTER HARDING

“competent but commonplace” style, that half of the nineteenth century. The and shadows, until the head looks as but as lacking in vitality as the canvases of the Cincinnati Museum Association

REMNANTS OF ENGLISH INFLUENCE

a young giant, over six feet in height and of great strength, expending the latter until his twenty-first year in the rough hardships of pioneer work. Then he supported a roving existence by peddling and chair-making, settling down for a little while as a tavern-keeper, and then moving afield again until he reached Pittsburgh. Here, while engaged as a house-painter, he made the acquaintance of a travelling portrait-painter, who kindled his imagination but refused him any technical instruction. Undeterred, however, by this early symptom of trades unionism, he went to work with brushes and paint and produced what was at least a resemblance of his wife. The rest is a story of steady endeavour. Having gained some facility, he migrated to Kentucky, thence to Cincinnati and St. Louis, everywhere securing customers and increasing alike in his skill and prices. Finally he reached Boston, and, meeting with a success that seems to have impaired even the popularity of Gilbert Stuart, established himself in that city, which, except during a visit paid to England, continued to be his home until his death in 1866. Like Inman, he enjoyed in England a very considerable vogue. But, so far as I am acquainted with his work, it never equalled Inman's at its best, and is rather on a par with that painter's average work; creditably lifelike, but lacking in distinction either of character or style.

It is in the latter respect that Charles Loring

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Elliott proved himself in advance of his time. The son of an architect in Auburn, New York, where he was born in 1812, his father wished him to follow his own profession. But, set on being a painter, he was allowed to go to New York, where Trumbull gave him some instruction, which was afterward supplemented by an indifferent painter named Quidor. But it had involved a good deal of drawing from the cast, and resulted in Elliott becoming a sure and ready draughtsman. His skill in paint, however, must have been the product of a natural gift, for he developed a facility in using the brush, fully charged with paint, that had a character of its own and was expressive also of character in the sitter. He could not have learned this from his contemporaries, and it is not recorded that he ever went abroad, so that this individuality and meaningfulness of brushwork are the more remarkable. He anticipated by some instinct the qualities of painting that, during the generation after his death in 1868, were acquired by others from abroad.

* * * * *

The genre painting of the middle of the century is interesting to-day chiefly as an illustration of the kind of picture that amused our forebears and still amuses those of us who care more about some little anecdotal subject-matter than the method of the painting. Because of the perennial nature of this

CHARLES LORING ELLIOT

such as this one, which fully sustains his reputation as a portrait-painter of the middle of the nineteenth

Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York

REMNANTS OF ENGLISH INFLUENCE

preference and the fact that John G. Brown's long career bridges the past with the present, we may select him as typical of the many genre painters that might be mentioned.

We shall again have occasion to notice genre painting when we consider the influence of Düsseldorf; for the present let us summarise the English phases of it. It originated with Hogarth in the first half of the eighteenth century; firstly, in his little domestic groups or "conversation pictures," as he called them; secondly, in the scenes from fashionable life or vulgar life, which, as he explains, he composed "on canvas similar to representations on the stage." "My picture is my stage, and men and women my players, who by means of certain actions or gestures are to exhibit a dumb show."

This was a motive very different from that of the Dutch genre. While the latter was occasionally preoccupied with the rendering of incidents, its best and most usual characteristic was the prime intention of making a picture, in which the incident was assigned to a secondary function of supplying an excuse for a beautiful arrangement of colour and light and shade. The Dutchmen were painters first, illustrators of manners second, but seldom moralists, as Hogarth was. Such picture-dramas, as the series of Marriage à la Mode, proceed from act to act with a logic as relentless, a satire as pungent, a moral force as compelling, as the dramas of

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Ibsen. On the other hand, like the latter's, they are saved by their art from being didactic. Hogarth, besides being a moralist, was an excellent painter. Yet the latter quality is the one that was overlooked by the public on whom the didactic, story-telling, literary-dramatic features of his pictures made a deep impression. They helped to confirm the English preference, not, however, exclusively English, for what is intelligible to the understanding rather than suggestive to the imagination, for intellectual concreteness rather than abstract sensations. They established the vogue of the picture which enacts a scene.

Fifty years after Hogarth, Moreland approached nearer to the Dutch genre. He, too, was an excellent painter, and his pictures of rural scenes are thoroughly pictorial in their charm of colour and light. But he lived at a time when the highest thing in art was held to be the painting of the historical or mythological subject in the "grand manner" of the Italians, and a public, intent on subject matter rather than on qualities of painting, considered his work vulgar. The same charge was brought still fifty years later against the genre pictures of Wilkie; but by this time the reputation of the bombastic picture was a little stale, the middle class was coming to its own, and popularity with the public meant success to the painter. Wilkie, accordingly, followed by Landseer and Mulready, all three of them clever practitioners with the brush, so far as representing the actual appearances of things, held their own in the popular estimation, and followers of them, less skilful with the brush, confirmed the public in their appetite for the story-telling pictures. The latter were no longer trenchant with satire, but amiably humorous or sentimental: little literary pleasantries in paint. It was this sort of influence that John G. Brown inherited and has continued to transmit.

REMNANTS OF ENGLISH INFLUENCE

He was born at Durham, England, in 1831. He attended the schools of the Edinburgh Academy, and also painted in London until 1856, when he transferred his life and work to New York. With the quick eye of a stranger for what is novel to him, he began to paint the types of people around him, and then the street boys of New York. His pictures of the boy upon the sidewalk, selling papers, shining shoes, or larking with his fellows, won admirers, and he has continued to paint them ever since. Such consistency to one subject was no doubt the result, partly of choice, partly of the taste of his public. His genial nature has always gone out to his boy-subjects; he has discovered the best that is in them and represented it with sympathy, though, it must be admitted, with some sacrifice of reality. For his boys have a mildness and ingenuousness that, to the casual observer, at least, is not characteristic of the class. But this very softening of the type pleased a sentimental public, and they insisted on having Brown's street boys as they had learned through him to know them. In this way not a few painters are compelled, whether they wish it or not, to go on repeating their motives. The public, demanding an example of what it calls one of their "characteristic" pictures, will not let them change.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

So there are few collectors in this country who have not at some time or other owned a "Brown"; still fewer who have not in the course of their artistic development disposed of it. The reason of the public taste is not difficult to trace. In the early stage of our appreciation we are attracted, as I have already said, by the subject matter of the picture. The first consideration is—"What is it about?" Then, if it is about something with which we are familiar, we take a curious delight in identifying all the little details of resemblance to reality—the bristles in the blacking-brush, the label on the bottle, the seam of the breeches, and the stitches of the patch. It all looks "so natural," and we think it a wonderful piece of painting; because in our infancy of appreciation, just as in our infancy of age, we place a high value on the faculty of imitation. To mew like a cat is quite an accomplishment, so also to make a painted boy look like a real boy.

At least we think it looks "real," but this is a begging of the whole question. We shall come to this topic of realism later on, when we describe how our painters came in contact with the teachings and study of realism abroad, but meanwhile may briefly anticipate the inquiry, Are these boys of Brown's regarded as character studies, really like the boys of the streets? Have not their crude mixture of good and bad, of ugliness and attractiveness, their queer, intensely human, if distorted, individuality been scoured to a characterless propriety, and polished into a meek amiability by an application of moral sapolio, until they may be fit for the parlour but are no longer suggestive of the streets? Compare, for example, the studies of street boys which Murillo made, as they lay basking in the sunshine of the market place of Seville. These, indeed, are the real thing, even to the sun-caked dirt on their feet, which so disturbed Ruskin. And the pictures of them have a further pictorial reality. The warm air envelopes their lazy bodies, the sunshine burnishes their limbs. There is no suggestion of air in Brown's pictures, no light of nature, no burnish save that of varnished paint. Actual boys in actual daylight could not look like his; the latter have neither realism of character nor realism of representation. Still less have these pictures the capacity to arouse an abstract enjoyment through the qualities of colour, light and shade, and tonality.

REMNANTS OF ENGLISH INFLUENCE

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

In brief, then, it was to learn to look at nature naturally, and to represent it as it is, and yet with such creative artifice of technical charm as shall affect the imagination independently of the subject, that our painters had to seek inspiration from abroad. England had failed them; Düsseldorf and Munich will be tried and found wanting; the lesson, at last, will be acquired in France.

CHAPTER VI

THE INFLUENCE OF DÜSSELDORF AND MUNICH

IT was in the beginning of the 'fifties that American painting came under the influence of Düsseldorf. We have noted already that the landscape painters, James M. Hart and Albert Bierstadt, were students of its Academy, and shall now allude to the two figure-painters, Emanuel Leutze, who was a distinct product of its teaching, and Eastman Johnson, who outlived its influence. Further, we shall note how greatly the importation of Düsseldorf pictures affected the taste of the American public.

The reputation of Düsseldorf as an artistic centre had been the growth of some twenty-five years, since Schadow had been appointed director of its Academy and had gathered around him a body of students who remained faithful to the spot and bound themselves into a community, as interesting as it was unique. Let it be said at once that Schadow's influence rested upon the fact that he was a real painter; and that, while others were draughtsmen who tinted their drawings with paint, he revived in Germany the art of actually constructing the picture in paint—the art, in fact, of painting. But the characteristic distinction of Düsseldorf, at first, was a psychological one. This quaint little town upon the Rhine had become, as early as 1830, the nucleus of German Romanticism. Bound together by sympathy with this spirit, the painters spent their days in painting, their evenings and occasions of recreation in reinforcing their imaginations with the reading and discussing of Romantic poetry and legends. The world of the present did not exist for them, their preoccupation was solely with the past. Mendelssohn, the musician, for a while was a member of the little community; but the one person, not a painter, who exerted the greatest influence on the movement was a certain Judge Immerman, the reformer of the stage at Düsseldorf. Under his direction two performances a week were given, and the younger painters engaged in amateur performances. The stage became a mirror of the past. In it the painters found suggestions for representing the themes derived from literature and legendary tradition.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Such was the inspiration at Düsseldorf. It was not a product of the present that had in it the capacity of further growth. Moreover, its dependence upon literature and the drama had in it the germ of sterility. For, by the time that the original fervour of a Schadow and a Lessing had dwindled to the poetic sentimentality of a Schirmer, what had been an alliance with the written and spoken word sank into a bondage to it. And even when the precise and petty style of brushwork, which since Schadow's time had characterised the methods of Düsseldorf, was later broadened and enriched by some of its followers who, like Knaus and Vautier, studied subsequently in Paris, their pictures could not escape altogether the taint of their literary inspiration.

DÜSSELDORF AND MUNICH

Lessing, the strongest of all the school, became the teacher of Emanuel Leutze. Though the latter was a native of Germany, having been born at Gmund, in Württemberg, in 1816, he is reckoned an American painter, since he was brought to Philadelphia as a child, and received his first instruction there, and, in after years, when his course at Düsseldorf had been supplemented by study at Vienna, Munich, and Rome, settled permanently in this country, dividing his time between New York and Washington.

His best-known picture, and, by general assent, his strongest, is Washington Crossing the Delaware, now in the Metropolitan Museum. It has one virtue: it is simple and sincere, without heroics. It almost illustrates the incident as it may have been conducted by men far too absorbed in the peril and possible failure of the enterprise to have any thought of arranging themselves in a striking theatrical group. On the other hand, it represents a plodding and constrained method of brushwork, tame even in a small canvas, spread here over one that measures twenty-one feet by twelve. It is worthy of note that with Leutze the attempt of American painters to execute large historical subjects ceased, not to be revived until nearly fifty years later, when it reappeared in Abbey.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

While Leutze worked upon this picture in Düsseldorf, Eastman Johnson was one of his pupils. When still a youth in his home at Lovell, Maine, where he was born in 1824, Johnson had begun to make portraits in crayon, and with so much success that at twenty-one he moved to Washington, and later to Cambridge and Boston, securing patrons in all these cities. He was now in a position to go abroad, and at Düsseldorf improved his drawing and acquired a knowledge of painting. Fortunately he supplemented his study with a four years' sojourn in Holland, during which he familiarised himself with the Dutch paintings of the seventeenth century. Their influence was twofold. It led him to prefer genre subjects to historical, and developed his own natural gift of colour. At a time when the prime consideration both with painters and the public was that a picture should represent an incident, a poem, or a story, he, following the example of the Dutch artists, learned, while choosing a subject of popular appeal, to treat it as an opportunity of inventing a scheme of harmonious colouring. In a word, he merged the narrator

WASHINGTON CROSSING THE DELAWARE

EMANUEL LEUTZO

A DISTINGUISHED example of the subject-picture produced after the Düsseldorf manner, good in drawing and full of spirit, but theatrical in composition and hard in drawing. Under the circumstances of the actual occasion, would the safety of the whole boatload have been imperilled by three of the party standing up? Truth was sacrificed to an effective tableau. Instead of the picture being filled with atmosphere which would soften the outlines of the figures, the latter stand out sharply against what is only a back cloth.

In the Collection of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York

DÜSSELDORF AND MUNICH

in the artist. After his return to America, he painted many pictures of country-life in New York State and Kentucky, and during the war many subjects of patriotic significance. They are small in size, but broad in handling, having little of the tightness and dry smoothness of surface characteristic of Düsseldorf. They are also very charming in colour, the work of a man who could enrich the mere subject matter with artistic suggestion.

In the portraits also that occupied his later life he exhibited the Dutch faculty of seizing the external character of his sitter, and of depicting it in a forcible and straightforward way. Although they lack the dash and bravura of some modern portraits, they hold their own by their disciplined methods of virility and decision.

At Düsseldorf, as we have hinted, the flames of Romanticism dwindled to the candle light of domestic genre; the drama was superseded by light opera, and a virtuous and picturesque peasantry, seen across the mild effulgence of rose-coloured footlights, thronged the stage. Until Millet pricked the pretty bubble of misrepresentation, and taught men to study human life as it really is, these fancy idylls of peasant genre, turned out from Düsseldorf or under its influence, flooded our American market. Anyone who is conversant with the operations of the picture salesrooms knows how large a part they have played in the greater number of collections. Their popular appeal may have done much to interest people in pictures, but it certainly postponed for a considerable time a just appreciation of the true nature of pictorial art.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

* * * * *

By the middle of the century the fame of Düsseldorf, as a school, had passed to Munich. The latter's relation to American art, in point of time, began after the topic which is to be treated in the next chapter; but it will be convenient to dispose of it here, particularly as it represented only a brief phase of foreign study and had no abiding influence. The ideal of Munich was the historical picture: its greatest pride, Piloty. The latter's training had been enforced by foreign study, especially in Paris, and when he returned home in 1855 he produced a sensation, for among the Munich painters of the day, who had almost lost the sense of colour, he suddenly appeared as a master of what he called "colouristic realism." He had, that is to say, a faculty of representing vigorously with broad strokes and juicy brushwork the colour properties and appearances of objects. If he painted a boot, for example, there was no mistaking its bootlike quality; it was leather, sure enough, black and hard and polished, and gleaming with high lights—unmistakably a boot.

TWO MEN

EASTMAN JOHNSON

THIS double portrait is distinguished by the dignity and character of the heads, by ease of gesture and firmness of drawing in the figures, and by a rich and fairly luminous color-scheme. It was painted in 1881.

In the Collection of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York

DÜSSELDORF AND MUNICH

Moreover, Piloty was a man of mental vigour, with the German exuberance of temperament, that entered heartily into the grandeur of the historical ideal, and attacked the intricacies of a crowded canvas with the assurance and facility of a man pulling on his gloves. By him the dramatic motive was introduced upon a larger stage with a fuller company of principals and supers, a more magnificent mise-en-scène, and a more grandiloquent libretto. For, though he taught men how to paint, he tightened for a time the bondage of painting to literature. It was not yoked, as at Düsseldorf, to a peasant's ox cart, but followed behind a triumphal car, on which History sat enthroned. Nor was he a great painter in the modern sense of the term. His realism was of the mannered kind. It did not take account of the appearance of things in real light and atmosphere, but imitated with a plentiful use of the brown pigment, bitumen, the heavy shadows of the old pictures in the galleries, discoloured by time and dirt and varnish. Among the pupils whom his magnetism attracted and who subsequently became professors at Munich were Wagner and Diez, the latter a robust painter of old German scenes in small pictures of delicate tonality, modelled on the genre of the Dutchmen. It was under these three men that a few of our painters received instruction: Frederick Dielman studying with Diez, William M. Chase with

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Piloty and Wagner, while the latter was one of the teachers of Walter Shirlaw during his six years' stay in Munich.

The interest of this Munich episode in its relation to the story of American painting centres around Duveneck and Chase because of the influence they have exerted upon others. The former spent ten years in Munich, and during that time himself became a teacher. Among those who studied with him there, and in the little village of Polling in the Bavarian Alps, and in Venice, were John W. Alexander, Frederick P. Vinton, Joseph R. De Camp, and Julian Story. For many years he has been instructor in painting at the Cincinnati Art School.

Indeed, it is as a teacher, rather than as a producer of pictures, that his position is notable. He was the first of American instructors to make the brushwork instead of the crayon-drawing the foundation of the picture; to impart a painter's rather than a draughtsman's point of view. Instead of completing an elaborately shaded drawing and then painting over it with a careful observance of the lines and details and more or less finishing up of each part as one proceeded, he taught the student to cover his canvas with paint, boldly blocking in the large masses of the subject; afterwards superimposing the various succeeding planes to produce the modelling, and, in order to secure an own. The brushwork, and direct. It reflects the artist had learned

FRANK DUENECK

Museum Association

WILLIAM M. CHASE

...nice in feeling as in the delicate of the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, Philadelphia

DÜSSELDORF AND MUNICH

ensemble of effect, gradually advancing the whole canvas through the separate stages to a finish.

Whether Chase learned this process from Duveneck, or acquired it subsequently from the example of the famous French teacher, Carolus-Duran, whose somewhat similar method we shall discuss in another chapter, it has been the one that he also has imparted to innumerable students. But his influence has not been confined to the public; he has taken a leading part in most of the artistic movements of the last twenty-five years, and has been prominent at exhibitions with his own pictures. In oils, water-colours, pastels, and even etchings he has proved his versatility, revealing an extraordinary dexterity in the use of each medium, and a refined sense for the pictorial qualities of colour, tone, and lighting. Portraits, genre subjects, landscape, and still life have occupied him by turns. A few of his portraits, notably The Woman in a White Shawl, exhibit genuine insight and feeling; but these are qualities one does not generally associate with his work, any more than one looks for evidence of imagination. It is with the external appearances that he is preoccupied; he is primarily and almost exclusively a painter, pure and simple.

It was not until about 1875 that the older of these Munich students made their mark in the exhibitions at home; so that we have anticipated by many years the place which the school occupies chronologically in our story. But as I have said before, it seemed convenient to dispose of this phase of it, that the French influence, which is now to occupy our attention, may be considered without interruption.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

SUMMER IDYLL

WALTER STRIBAN

AN example of the Munich influence at its best. Landscape and figures are well drawn and solidly painted. But the feeling is of the studio, not of nature. The coloring is not of Münte seen in outdoor light, while the grouping of the figures with the obvious repetitions and contrasts of line is distinctly academic.

WILLIAM MORRIS HUNT

for strong and simple lines and distinguished also by a noble sincerity the collection of Mrs. Richard Morris Hunt

CHAPTER VII

THE BEGINNING OF FRENCH INFLUENCE: THE BARBIZON

FROM the middle of the century onward France has been the main source of influence, as well for American painting as for that of other countries. In a word, painting has been affected like other departments of thought and culture by the centripetal tendencies of modern times. The ease and rapidity of modern communication has drawn the world into closer and more intimate consciousness of what is being thought and accomplished elsewhere, so that a free trade in ideas, resulting in a kind of cosmopolitanism, is the characteristic of the day. And for painting, the clearing house of the world has been Paris.

This, however, is not to be understood as implying that American painting is to-day merely an offshoot of French art, having no character or quality of its own. Later on in our story we may be able to discover some traits sufficiently marked and widespread to constitute an American characteristic, and without doubt we shall find plenty of evidence of individuality on the part of separate painters; yet it is no less true that the foundations of our progress have been derived from Paris. They consist in motive and method.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

It is from the conflict of opinions upon these topics, which has occupied Paris for the past fifty years, that our painters, like those of other nations, have derived, on the one hand, their point of view, their way of looking at their subject; and, on the other, their manner of representing it. The particular use which they have made of both is the measure in each case of the painter's individuality.

Nor is the conflict of which Paris has been the centre founded upon entirely novel principles; it has been largely concerned with the readjustment to its own times of old ones. Briefly, it has been the modern phase of the old perpetual struggle between conservatism and progress; and to appreciate it properly we must recognise the advantage alike of the one and of the other: of conservatism as the expression of something fundamentally and perennially desirable, of progress as the adaptation of this to the forward spirit of the age. Painting, no more than any other art, can afford to detach itself from the past, still less stand still in the face of the present. If it is to be vital, it cannot be a stagnant pool; its tributary streams and tidal movements must be related to the ocean of great waters.

The conservative element in modern art has been supplied by the Academic system, notably in Paris by that of the French Academy and its official school, the École des Beaux Arts; while the progressive involves the various efforts which individuals or groups have made to combat it. At the middle of the century, when the three pioneers of Paris-seeking students—Hunt, Inness, and La Farge—went abroad, the issue was between the École on the one hand and the Barbizon movement on the other. A generation later, individualism having adopted a number of cries, was exhibiting itself under various aspects of realism, impressionism, “art for art’s sake,” and plein air; all of which, like the earlier Barbizon movement, were but attempts to render nature naturally, rather than in accordance with certain principles, adhered to arbitrarily, as it was thought, by the Academy.

BEGINNING OF FRENCH INFLUENCE

The latter, with its École des Beaux Arts, has been officially maintained in order to preserve a standard of excellence and a system of teaching. Both are based upon the pre-eminence of line over colour, of drawing over painting. Such an out-and-out doctrinaire as Ingres asserted that “Form is everything, colour nothing.” Whether the doctrine be applied to landscape or figure painting, it implies the superiority of art over nature, and the need of modifying the forms of nature that they may be made to emulate the perfection of classic models. Thus the so-called classic landscape is an elaborate piecing together of natural and architectural features, selected from various sources, including the imagination, and assembled on the canvas to produce an ideal composition, that shall affect us in a purely abstract way by the dignity of line and massing.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

It was this attitude towards nature that the painters of the Barbizon group opposed, both in their lives and in their art. They set out, not to improve upon nature, but to learn from it. Anticipating the spirit of scientific research which became the leading characteristic of the age, they substituted for abstract and typical generalisations an intimate study of individual appearances. In studying the individuality of nature they became themselves intensely individual—thus embodying another leading characteristic of the age. They discovered also a new conception of the ideal.

It was founded, not, as in the case of the Academicians, upon fancied perfection, but upon truth. It was the result of a new principle of selection. Instead of borrowing from many sources or of modifying the forms to produce an arbitrary perfection, it selected from the scene itself its salient features, eliminating the unessentials and compressing the whole into a vivid synthesis. And the latter included not merely the external appearance, but the inward spirit of the scene.

Through communing with nature, these men acquired so strong a sympathy with their subject that the mood of their own spirit became reflected in nature; their works interpreted their own souls in terms of nature; they were nature-poets. It was in this respect that their idealism was of a new kind, based, not upon a material perfection, but on spiritual expression. This again was a very wonderful anticipation of what came to be the need of the nineteenth century. In the rapid advance of materialism, the claims of spirit were being overlooked; and not the least of the benefits conferred on painting by the men of Barbizon, was this restoration of spirit to its proper relation to matter. They became, one might almost say, the religious painters of the century. Add to this loftiness of motive the fact that they were in a technical sense excellent craftsmen, and the importance of the influence which they exerted upon the first of our France-seeking students may be realised. It was fortunate also that these students—William Morris Hunt, George Inness, and John La Farge—were men of commanding ability. The impressions gleaned at Barbizon were transmitted by them to other painters in this country, and to the general public, with a degree of authority and persuasiveness that have given the principles involved a firm and lasting hold upon the American imagination.

BEGINNING OF FRENCH INFLUENCE

Hunt, the oldest of the trio and the first to go abroad, was born at Brattleboro, Vermont, in 1824. He entered Harvard, but was compelled by poor health to seek the benefit of a change of climate, and accordingly went to Düsseldorf and joined the Art Academy, with the intention of becoming a sculptor. This was in 1846. Nine months later he moved to Paris, suddenly altered his plans for the future, and determined to be a painter. Perhaps the fame of a certain picture, Romans of the Decadence, and the extraordinary interest which its appearance at the Salon of 1847 aroused, had something to do with stimulating his imagination in a new direction; at any rate it was the painter of this picture whom he sought as a teacher. He joined the studio of Couture. The latter, a pupil of Delaroche, had been trained in the "classic" manner of drawing the figure, which may be summed up in Tennyson's description of Maud:

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

"Faultily faultless, icily regular, splendidly null; Dead perfection, no more."

But in Couture's case the frigid and sculptor-like character of the so-called "ideal" figure was warmed with a romantic ardour and enriched with colour. It was this combination of qualities that had created a sensation; for it seemed to reconcile the conservatism of the older men with the eager throb of younger life. Yet as a matter of fact, the picture, like its subject, belonged to an older order of things and had no relation to the spirit of the age. The latter, in scientific and mechanical affairs, was directed to an exact study of the cause and effect of natural phenomena; in literature, likewise, to a realistic examination of present life. This picture, with its elaborate classic setting, composed of fragments of Roman architecture cemented together by the painter's imagination, with its crowd of voluptuaries, men and women, under the influence of liquor, in shameless abandonment, contained an element of perennial truth. By inference men could draw from it a moral for the present, but it was hidden under a masquerading of the past. Zola, presenting the same moral, clothed in the actual forms of the rich and poor of his own time, thereby made it sting the conscience of the public. That was shocking, for people do not like the naked truth. In this picture there was no such violation of propriety; the truth was, as it were, only nude; nakedness diffused through a prism of make-believe perfection—art not life.

BEGINNING OF FRENCH INFLUENCE

But there was a contemporary of Couture's whose ideal was art and life; life in art, art vitalised by the expression of life. As yet, however, he was only that "wild man of the woods," Jean François Millet, unheeded. He, too, in his early struggle for bread had painted "ideal nudes"; now his subjects were the peasants of Barbizon, rough-hewn types of men and women, coarsened and twisted out of shape by toil, as far removed as possible from Couture's.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Yet Hunt, and it is a strange fact, became, during the latter part of his sojourn in France, as strongly influenced by Millet as he had been by Couture. Perhaps it may be explained in this way: Starting out with the intention of being a sculptor, he had evidently a prior sensitiveness to form; then, as he came to know pictures, the feeling for colour was aroused; he found both satisfied in Couture's work. Moreover, he had come out to learn, and the student's first craving is for definite formularies. Couture, well equipped with set methods and maxims, could show his pupils exactly "how to do it," and in his studio Hunt remained for several years, an enthusiastic follower of the master's technique.

But gradually the eagerness of the mere student abated. The influence of Millet, coming later, touched a maturer need. Firstly, it gave him the inspiration of a motive. Millet's uncouth simplicity of truth struck a vein of sincerity in himself. It taught him a notion of the "ideal" very different from the one aimed at and inculcated in Couture's studio—an idealisation, not of unnatural perfection, but of human nature as it is, not of high-wrought passion and romance, but of the fulfilment of the daily routine of duty. It was a motive at once artistic and moral, based on Truth. And secondly, it was presented with a correspondingly simple sincerity of technique. Millet's strong, broad generalisation was as far removed from the exquisite refinement of Couture's method as from the niggling exactness of the Düsseldorfians; its grand sweep of line and dignity of masses were not obviously enforced, but to be discovered under the guise of clumsy forms; it was a method in which nothing is sacrificed to truth of nature, and yet commonplace is always overcome by art.

BEGINNING OF FRENCH INFLUENCE

It was a technique so peculiarly the product of Millet's own conscience that it was not to be learned by anyone else; and the principle which it involved, of beginning with nature and ending in art, was so different from Couture's, which was art only, first, last, and all the time, that Hunt never wholly emerged from the conflict of these two influences. He attempted to affect a compromise, but with only partial success, and remained to the end a painter of whom more might have been expected than he actually achieved, since he never gained the assurance of belief in himself which is possessed by many a smaller man.

Returning home, he settled in Newport, Rhode Island, and then moved to Boston, where the remainder of his life was spent. Around him gathered a number of pupils, impressed by the charm of his personality and the dignity of his artistic ideals. This in itself helped to impede his own technical advancement, since it kept him over-occupied with theories and limited his opportunities for the actual practice of painting.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Yet this sacrifice of himself certainly redounded to the benefit of others, for he sowed the seed which has since grown and multiplied. The gist of his teaching was that it is not the subject but the way in which the subject is rendered, that determines the artistic merit of a picture; that in the hands of an artist, any subject, no matter how simple and insignificant, can be made artistic, and that this artistic quality, a product and expression of himself, is what the painter should aim chiefly to embody in his pictures. Furthermore, that the ideal of good brushwork is not to concern one's self with niggling precision of detail for detail's sake, but to obtain truth of character and expression.

A writer in the 'sixties describes his work as "naïve," which, from our present point of view, it certainly was not. There is nothing in it of the child-spirit; on the contrary, very much of the virile and intellectual. But it displayed, what was an unfamiliar quality to his contemporaries, a capacity for seeing artistic possibilities in the simplest subjects.

Turn to the accompanying reproduction of The Bathers. There is here involved no elevated conception, as in Cole's Course of Empire, nor grandeur of visible appearance, as in Church's Coto-

WILLIAM MORRIS HUNT

against the popular interest half of the claims of paint-figure is but an excuse for texture of the flesh and the

Mrs. Richard Morris Hunt

Artle and Cameron

WILLIAM MORRIS HUNT

and the fresh tones, golden in the his beautiful picture.

BEGINNING OF FRENCH INFLUENCE

paxi, yet, as a picture, it is vastly superior to either. The reason is that in the making of it the artist's motive was a joy in the possibilities of beautiful expression that the subject offered. First, the poise of the figure, the elastic force of the body and limbs, suspended rather than resting in perfect ease of balance; secondly, the charm of colour as the sunlight plays over the nude form, glistening upon the ripples of flesh, illuminating the shadowed parts and kindling all the tones into a healthy, vigorous glow. Everything else in the picture is made contributory to these two possibilities of beautiful expression—poise and sunlit flesh-colour—so that, if you had the good fortune to see the original at the recent Comparative Exhibition, I think you will agree that it communicated a heightened sense of joy in life.

If this is so, then, you will observe this picture after all has an idea involved in its subject that appeals to the imagination. We perhaps reach the heart of the matter when we realise that an idea may be an abstract one, not connected with any definite individual or incident, about which a great deal can be said in words, or which can be described in the form of a story. But the trouble is that so many people are lacking in imagination, or, even if they have imagination, it is not stirred by feeling, it needs to have the idea conveyed to it through a tale of words. I wonder how many people cared about Millet's Man With a Hoe before Mr. Markham versified its appeal, and, on the other hand, how many of those who had appreciated it already found the appreciation increased by the verbal exposition?

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Hunt's pictures included portraits, figure-subjects, and landscapes, some of the last named containing sheep, which are painted with a truth of character that recalls the work of Jacque. At a time when precision of detail was apt to be considered the highest requisite in a picture, Hunt substituted for it truth of character and expression. Some of his portraits are said to have been indifferent likenesses, but the representation, as it appears in the picture, is invested with distinction and seeming individuality. His last important works were two decorative paintings for the Capitol at Albany, which, owing to a threatened collapse of the dome, have been hidden by a ceiling, and have perished. They were executed under a very severe pressure of having to be finished by a certain date, and the strain proved too much for the artist. He died the following year (1879), at the Isle of Shoals.

* * * * *

George Inness was a pathfinder whose originality and fiery zeal for nature blazed a new trail that has led on to the present notable expansion of American landscape painting. Born at Newburg,

BEGINNING OF FRENCH INFLUENCE

New York, in 1825, the son of a retired grocer, he was apprenticed as a youth to an engraver. This, as we have seen, was the profession in which those landscape painters of the Hudson River School, Kensett, Durand, and Casilear, began by achieving success. In fact, at that time it was the one branch of art most likely to yield a comfortable livelihood, but it was of too exacting a nature for the frail health of George Inness. His father would have set him up in business, but the son's heart was resolutely fixed on things artistic, and he sought instruction from a French painter residing in New York. For the rest, Inness was his own teacher, though the tenor of his career was changed into a new direction by the influence of the Barbizon artists.

He went abroad in 1850, and again for a longer period in 1870. We will attempt to summarise the impressions derived from the two visits.

Hitherto he had been chiefly engaged in studying form, in learning to draw the appearance of trees and rocks and ground, of water and sky. It may have been his short experience in engraving or the example of Durand and Kensett that set his study in this direction, but the thoroughness with which he pursued it was from within himself, an instinct for analysis, derived perhaps from his Scotch ancestry.

He learned, first of all, that principle of synthesis, of selection and arrangement, to which I have already alluded, that the best art does not consist in representing everything in sight, but in discovering what are the salient and essential characteristics, and in setting these down in a masterly summary. He learned, in effect, the value of omitting details so as to secure additional force for the ensemble; and his previous rigour of minute study now helped him, for it is recognised among artists that only he who has learned to put in, can be successful in leaving out.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

He learned, in the second place, a new motive: no longer to look for "views" in nature, but to study fragments of it intimately; to render portraits of nature, in which the local facts should be of importance, not as facts, but as vehicles of expression. It was a mood of nature, or a mood aroused in himself, that he strove to embody; and, by thus becoming a subjective painter, he cut himself off entirely from the objectivity of contemporary American landscape. And the peculiar quality of his subjective motive is interesting.

In his temperament the logical was combined with the spiritual. He was given to reasoning upon the eternities, and for many years was a professed Swedenborgian. Thus he was particularly drawn toward Corot, in whose work he recognised the spirituality. In fact, Corot and Inness both approximated to what we shall later find to be one of the artist's own mood, induced by the clouds, and spread of landscape there is a dreamy warmth, as if the earth were in the artist's middle style, wherein details are both of the scene as a whole and of the collection of James W. Ellsworth, Esq.

GEORGE INNESS

GEORGE INNESS

shapes, massed against the luminosity shadowed meadow, touches into soft is a fine example of the expressive

BEGINNING OF FRENCH INFLUENCE

of the underlying principles of motive in Japanese art. It is, in effect, to distinguish between "appearance" and "reality"; to regard the material visibilities of nature, subject as they are to change, as being mere appearance, while the reality is the inward spirit, a portion of the Universal, Eternal Spirit, that is embodied in the impermanent appearances of matter. Both Corot and Inness came in time, like the Japanese painter, Hashimoto Gaho, to discover for themselves a method of painting in which they carried the principle of synthesis as far as possible, so as to subordinate the assertion of form to a suggestion of its essence or spirit. And lest some reader have no sympathy with this transcendental attitude toward nature, I would remind him that, if he is fond of nature, he must have experienced some occasion when to lie upon the ground and let the beauty of the scene, irrespective of this or that feature of the landscape, soak into him, was pleasure enough. If so, it was the result of physical contentment, leading to a satisfaction of the emotions; and from the latter to a consciousness of spiritual refreshment or elation is but a step, to many temperaments a natural and inevitable one.

This progression of Inness's motive and manner of painting, however, was a gradual one. Not all at once could he free himself from the habit of minute representation. His earliest pictures are liney, filled with details carefully drawn in with the brush. Later, his style, of which Peace and Plenty at the Metropolitan Museum is a good example, becomes broader; he no longer draws, but paints, with the brush; the objects begin to count as masses. Notwithstanding the large size of the canvas and the multiplying of features, which prevent us grasping the scene as a whole, the impression which it produces on the imagination is a tolerably single one, very well summed up in the title. It is a notable step in the direction of rendering the expression of the landscape. But compare the other example illustrated here, Midsummer, and note the progress which has been made in the way of synthesis. How masterful is the characterisation of the great oak tree! We recognise at once its lusty vigour and the luxuriant opulence of its massy green foliage. Yet note how little detail or even modelling it presents; it is painted flatly in broad, simple masses of tones of green, differing from one another in the amount of light which they reflect.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Later his pictures have still less solidity of painting; the pigment has been spread thinly with a large brush, and at close range the broad flat spaces of colour may seem to be perfunctory and careless. In reality, they are a mingling of subtly differentiated tones, pricked here and there with an accent of detail; and, when viewed from the proper stand-

PEACE AND PLENTY

GEORGE INNESS

PAINTED as early as 1865, this picture, 77 inches high and 112 wide, still shows a fondness for extended views and an analytical regard for details, characteristic of the "Hudson River School." But it also exhibits a mastery over the rendering of the forms of nature, which, when the artist had learned the value of synthesis, enabled him to suggest the forms with so pregnant an economy of means. In the evening glow that pervades the picture there is already a foretaste of the spirituality of the artist's later work.

In the Collection of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York

JOHN LA FARGE

of this artist's renotto Heinigke, Esq.

BEGINNING OF FRENCH INFLUENCE

point, a short distance from the frame, are full of meaning and suggestion. These landscapes are the product of a mind that, in the matter of painting, had freed itself from the necessity of conscious intellectual processes and entered into liberty of spirit, and of a hand become so facile by practice that it moved in immediate and faithful response to the suggestion of the mind. They are the expressions, not of what is palpable and material, but of an emotional or spiritual mood.

The artist died suddenly, during a visit to Scotland, in 1894.

CHAPTER VIII

JOHN LA FARGE

JOHN LA FARGE was born in New York in 1835, and grew up under conditions very favourable to the acquisition of superior knowledge and taste. For his father's house in Washington Square, well stocked with books and pictures and prints, was a rendezvous of cultivated people, many of them belonging to families who had escaped the revolutions in France and San Domingo. Thus his classical studies at school, which were of the old-fashioned, extensive, and thoughtful kind, were supplemented by the literary, artistic, and critical atmosphere of the home life.

In 1856 he visited Paris, residing with his cousin, Paul de St. Victor, a writer and critic, in whose house he came into direct touch with the best thought of Paris of that day. During his "wander-year" in Europe he visited Munich, Dresden, and London, but returned home at length with the conviction that the most important developments of the day were represented by the Barbizon artists, Rousseau, Corot, and Millet, and by Delacroix. He now entered a lawyer's office in New York, for, as he says, "No one has struggled more against his destiny than I; nor did I for many years acquiesce in being a painter. Though I learned the methods and studied the problems of my art, I had hoped to find some other mode of life, some other way of satisfying the desire for a contemplation of truth, unbiased, free, and undetached."

JOHN LA FARGE

To my mind there is something very interesting in this slow, gradual growth of La Farge toward the vocation in which he has since become so distinguished, that he may be reckoned the most profoundly learned artist that America has yet produced. His love of art antedated his professional practice of it; he pursued it, first of all, as a branch of the wider culture in which he was training himself; and, at an age when most students are trying to adapt some little particular phase of art to their own purpose, he was seeking to discover its relation to the large field of human thought and life. In his case, for a time, the particular and the personal aspect of art was lost sight of in the universal aspect.

What I have in mind is the difference between thinking and working outward from a centre, and thinking and working inward toward the centre from the horizon of a large circumference. For example, the average student starts with learning to draw and paint the human figure. This is his tiny centre, and from it he begins to broaden out a little, arranging his figures into compositions, and by degrees, perhaps, making them the source of some kind of expressional appeal. But as a general rule, the start made in this way does not lead very far; the circle around the centre is circumscribed; the picture has little capacity to stir the emotions or the imagination, and shows a tendency to be mostly a manipulation, more or less dexterous, of the thing it started with—the drawing and painting of the human figure. On the other hand, suppose a man whose mind has been habitually directed toward the larger aspects of human life and its relations to its seen and unseen environment, who has learned to regard the scheme of men and things as parts of a vastness of design, the limits of which melt into infinity of time and space. He analyses the relations of these parts to one another and to the whole Universe, discovers principles of agreement and antagonism, and works, not by rule of thumb or at the uncertain beck of temperament, but along the lines of a plan that, for him at least, affords the basis of a sound hypothesis for motive and method. When a man, possessed of this habit of seeing things in relation to the Universal, draws inward to the particular that lies under his hand to be done, he brings to the doing of it qualities of mind and principles of practice that make the particular no longer a little of the late Mr. William H. Vanderbilt the Collection of Otto Heinigke, Esq

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

JOHN LA FARGE

JOHN LA FARGE

as in one of his windows in the Church subtle is the coloring under the varying light from the moon.

Collection of William T. Evans, Esq.

JOHN LA FARGE

centre from which to spread out tentatively, but the white-hot core into which are fused the forces that he has gathered from outside.

It has been so with La Farge. Just as art is to him only one of the phases of material and spiritual being, so an individual work of art, while suggesting to him that it is all sufficient in itself, a complete harmonious unity, will yet be the greater in its power to move and hold the imagination if it suggests also that it is but a fragment of a universal harmony and unity. He conceives of a "Universal Geometry," with which man's separate, fragmentary "plans" of arranged beauty—his works of art—can be and should be co-ordinated. Space will not allow me to pursue this idea, except to suggest an analogy to it in the laying out of Central Park, New York, by the late Mr. Frederick Law Olmsted. As you traverse it you are confronted with a great number of separate vistas; they appear one after the other, very different in character, yet each seems complete in itself. A fuller knowledge reveals that each is harmoniously related to the others, and that all are correlated to what, for the purpose of illustration, straining the words, we may call the "Universal Geometry" of the whole plan. And although this ultimate harmonising of all the different ingredients can nowhere or at any one time be seen with the eye, yet, when it has been once realised, it persuades the imagination to find a greater beauty than before in each part.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

When La Farge at length determined to follow the practice of art as a profession, he studied for a time under Hunt, at Newport, which place, since 1860, along with New York, has been identified with his work. The latter, apart from decoration, which will stand as the most striking manifestation of his genius, has consisted of oil paintings of landscape and flowers, of drawings for illustration, and of water-colours of scenes in Samoa and Japan. The last named are studies of the luxuriant colouring of vegetation, sky, water, and rock, rapidly brushed in under the spontaneous enthusiasm of the moment, and, to some extent, as notes or records of colour, to be elaborated later in some window or wall painting. His drawings, some of which were made to illustrate poems by Tennyson or Browning, are of unusual interest, powerful and subtle in characterisation, and beautiful also as a decoration of the page.

It is as a colourist that he has gained distinction and influenced others. Not that a man can learn to be a colourist; but the natural gift for it has to be cultivated, and in discovering new secrets for himself he has been a guide to others. During his early travel abroad he was naturally drawn toward the work of the old Venetian colourists; but, being an original genius, he could look outside of tradition, and was greatly interested in the colour experiments of Holman Hunt and John Everett Millais, two members of the Pre-Raphaelite brotherhood, and of Ford Madox Brown.

JOHN LA FARGE

It was one of the tenets of these young painters to represent everything exactly as they saw it, and accordingly to give each object its "local" colour. Other painters of the day imitated the prevailing tone of old pictures, that was partly the result of original use of glazes, partly of the fading out of colour, of the accumulation of dirt, and of successive varnishings. These men, however, put their bright colours in a vivid and harsh juxtaposition that, while it might be true to the local tints of nature, was artistically false. Could the natural and artistic truths be reconciled? If so, then the limited range of colours used in the convention of Venetian painting could be enlarged, reinforced, and intensified by the brilliance of nature's colouring.

Briefly, La Farge solved the problem. By degrees he discovered what we shall have occasion to refer to later, that the imitating of the local colours is only a part of truth to nature. To confine one's self to this is like taking fish out of the water in which they belong. The local colours must be represented in their own medium of lighted atmosphere, which surrounds all things and draws them together into a natural appearance of tone. Light, in a word, became the study of La Farge; light in its operation upon local colour; in the infinite diversity of its way of striking objects, directly or by reflection or refraction; and the diminution of light on objects, as things recede from the eye, owing to the layers of intervening atmosphere. He noted also that under the influence of light, a local colour is made more or less brilliant by the juxtaposition of other local colours, which in turn are similarly affected. This briefly summarises the principles gradually reached by La Farge, as the result partly of his own observations and partly of the research of scientists. Working thus independently, he anticipated, as we shall see later, the French artist, Manet, and the Impressionists, in applying their principles to painting.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

He began by working on subjects of still-life and flowers, turning later to landscape. Of the last he painted but a few examples, yet they are very remarkable. Like the Barbizon men, he depicted only a fragment of nature, comprehending it with intimacy of feeling, while, like a Pre-Raphaelite, he attempted an actual portrayal of the local colours of the scene; but he went further than either, in what he himself has called "the rendering of the gradations of light and air through which we see form"; and a step even beyond this, in that he was not satisfied with a generalised appearance of light, but sought to represent it under special aspects of time and season. Thus he not only had assimilated the foremost movements of that time, but also anticipated the later studies of Manet and Monet. The explanation of this fact, I believe, is that the advance made by Manet and Monet was based on scientific principles, upon the application to painting of that exact scrutiny of phenomena which was the predominate feature of thought in other phases of life, and that La Farge is himself a scientist as well as an artist. He has given an incidental corroboration of this in the following words: "There is in each competent artist a sort of unconscious automatic mathematician, who, like the harmonist in music, the colourist in painting, resolves in his way the problem of sight and sound which the scientist puts into an equation."

JOHN LA FARGE

A nature so compounded of the scientific and the artistic presents the kind of soil in which symbolism flourishes. In La Farge's case it produced some remarkable drawings, such as The Wolf Charmer, and attracted him toward the painting of religious subjects. But this phase of his work we will consider later in connection with mural painting. For the present let us notice how this combination of the scientific and artistic has served him in another branch of decoration, that of coloured windows.

It was a happy coincidence that to an artist, thus occupied with the problems of light, should have come an opportunity of working in the most translucent of all mediums—glass. It resulted in the practical invention of a new kind of material, and the production in the window of a richness and subtlety of colours impossible in the older form of glass.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

To put it as briefly as possible: the makers of so-called “stained glass” windows had used what is called in the trade “pot-metal,” that is to say, glass which is coloured in the mass, while it is molten in the crucible or pot. Such glass, which was imported from England, was necessarily limited in its range of colour, and there was also a limit to the amount of richness and subtlety that could be obtained by what is technically known as “plating,” that is, placing one tone or tint of glass behind another. Accordingly, the English window-makers, even such as Burne-Jones, relied chiefly upon the patterns of the forms, the drawing of the designs: But this would not satisfy La Farge, who saw his design from its inception, not in outline, but in full-fleshed form of colour.

He happened to be sick in bed, and, observing some toilet articles made of what is called “opal glass” in imitation of china, noticed that in the imperfect specimens the material, like an opal, exhibited, as well as the local colour, its complementary one.* He noticed also that when the opal

* White light being regarded as a combination of blue, red, and yellow, the complementaries to each is the union of the glass was placed alongside a piece of pot-metal the opalescent quality brought out a certain harmony. He felt he had discovered a means of increasing subtlety of colour effects, and of extra richness, too, for it is a known fact that the brilliancy of a colour is intensified by the juxtaposition of its complementary. Moreover, his mind, travelling quickly on, foresaw other possibilities in the use of this material, owing to the variety of modulations of thickness, surface, and colour to which it can be treated in the making.

JOHN LA FARGE

He began to experiment with pieces cut from objects made in opal glass, and then found a glass-maker who was willing to make him sheets of the material. He used it at first in conjunction with pot-metal, and gradually elaborated his methods, until, in the Battle Window in Memorial Hall, Harvard University, he combined a variety of effects. "In this window," he says, "I used almost every variety of glass that would serve, and even precious stones, such as amethysts and the like. And I began to represent effects of light and modulation of shadow by using streaked glass, glass of several colours blended, and glass wrinkled into forms, as well as glass cut into shapes, or blown into forms; even glass into which other glass had two others; thus red and yellow—orange, is the complementary of blue; blue and red—purple, that of yellow; blue and yellow—green, that of red.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

been deposited in patterns. I also painted the glass very much and carefully in certain places; so that in a rough way this window is an epitome of all the varieties of glass that I have seen used before or since."

This quotation gives some idea of the variations possible in the actual making of the material; and since the date of the Battle Window (1870) they have been multiplied. What is now called "American glass" is capable of unlimited effects; and in the hands of a master-colourist, like La Farge, it is an instrument which produces the richest harmonies and extraordinarily subtle orchestration. So far, no other artist has approached him in the variety and originality of his use of the material. It was the child of this artist-scientist's genius, and has yielded to him its choicest service.

* * * * *

The reader will remember that it was in the early 'fifties that Hunt, Inness, and La Farge sought their first impressions in France, and that, since that date, the movement of students had been to Düsseldorf and Munich. Indeed, it was not until the close of the third quarter of the century that Paris became the regular goal of American students.

JOHN LA FARGE

the drapery, has of the head is not But the main the subtlety of the and refracted lights an Gellatly, Esq.

WILL H. LOW

According to the academic point of view, the sentiment.

CHAPTER IX

FRENCH INFLUENCE—THE ACADEMIC

THE year 1876 is a memorable landmark in our industrial and artistic development. Then it was that the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia revealed for the first time to numbers of our people the artistic resources of the Old World. They were displayed not only in pictures and sculpture, but in the products of factories and workshops, and the lesson of the occasion was the commercial value as well as the desirableness of beauty. To the superior attractiveness of the foreign articles, in which the skill of the maker had been supplemented by artistic design and treatment, neither merchants nor public could be blind; and when, upon the close of the Exposition, a large number of these objects were presented to the City of Philadelphia, they were installed as a permanent exhibition of arts and crafts in one of the buildings at Fairmount Park. Then it was recognised that some practical step should be taken to give technical and artistic training to our own craftsmen. Accordingly, as the result of a citizen's movement, was founded the Philadelphia

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

School of Industrial Art, the first of its kind in this country.

The Centennial, however, only quickened and broadened forces that were already at work in the community. Gradually at first, and later with leaps and bounds, the little America of the Fathers had grown into a vast continent, already too small to confine the impetuous energies of its people. The increase and diffusion of wealth, and the growing facilities of oceanic transportation, prompted foreign travel, and made it easy; the barricades of national isolation were being broken down, and already the tide of travel toward Europe was in flood.

The familiarity with the art of the Old World, thus made possible to many, had already produced concrete results. In 1870 the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston, was incorporated, and the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, was granted a charter by the Legislature, which in the following year, at the request of the municipal authorities, passed an Act making an appropriation for a building in Central Park. These new museums, like the earlier Pennsylvania Academy, were organised by business and professional men. They were the product of the layman's interest in art. And, whereas, in the case of the older institution in Philadelphia, the motive had been the modest one of introducing "correct and elegant copies of works of the first masters in sculpture and painting," now the enterprise of the promoters was more ambitious, and their wealth made it possible to supplement the necessary copies of antique sculpture with original works of painting. The American amateur had begun to invade the foreign picture-market and offer alluring inducements to private owners to part with their treasures. When, therefore, the Centennial Exposition stirred the public imagination, there was already an active nucleus of organised and private appreciation of art around which the extended interest could gather. It served to give immense impetus to a movement already under way. But one thing more was needed—a stirring among painters themselves; and this, by a happy chance, coincided in point of time with the Exposition.

FRENCH INFLUENCE

During 1875 and 1876 the first harvest of Parisian teaching reached our country. A group of young painters arrived, trained in the newest methods of the French School, proclaiming its superiority, and equipped to prove it. They appeared at a moment when they could do much to draw attention to the Exposition, and also receive from it an indorsement of what they themselves stood for.

All along the line of artistic production it was realised that some approximation must be made to foreign methods and standards of taste, and here, at least in the department of painting, was a body of enthusiasts, eager and able to show the way.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

If you study the magazines of the period, you will find the evidence of an immediate and continuing improvement in the quality of the illustrations. It was primarily due to the quick apprehension of new talent on the part of the editors, and then, later, to the additional opportunity given to the artist by the gradual development of the photo-engraving process. But this exceedingly interesting chapter in our native art is outside the scope of our present story. More to the point is it that many of these younger men became teachers in our art schools, and thus effectually spread the knowledge of the new technique among students, until the French method of teaching has become the basis of instruction in this country.

But the way of these enthusiasts was not altogether smooth. By the older men of the National Academy of Design they were regarded somewhat as revolutionaries; troublesome disturbers of almost sacred traditions; dangerous, and not to be encouraged. Thus a cleavage in the ranks of painters ensued. Some of the older men, pre-eminently John La Farge, gave the new arrivals the support of their encouragement, and, as a consequence, a new organisation was effected. The Society of American Artists was founded in 1877, and incorporated the following year. John La Farge was elected president, and among its early members were Robert Swain Gifford, William Sartain, Louis C. Tiffany, J. Alden Weir, Will H. Low, William M. Chase, J. H. Twachtman, Abbott H. Thayer, Francis Lathrop, and D. Maitland Armstrong. These names belong to the years 1877-1879, and were supplemented a little later by those of Frederick Arthur Bridgman, Edwin H. Blashfield, George de Forest Brush, Thomas Allen, J. Carroll Beckwith, Robert F. Blum, Kenyon Cox, Bruce Crane, Frank Duveneck, Birge Harrison, Frank Fowler, George Inness, Jr., H. Bolton Jones, Francis C. Jones, George W. Maynard, Frank D. Millet, John H. Niemeyer, Eastman Johnson, Walter L. Palmer, William T. Smedley, Dwight W. Tryon, Elihu Vedder, Frederick P. Vinton, Douglas Volk, Sarah C. Whitman, George Fuller, Thomas Hovenden, William L. Picknell, Arthur Quartley, Charles S. Reinhart, Alexander H. Wyant, and Theodore Robinson.

FRENCH INFLUENCE

With very few exceptions these painters received their training abroad, and for the most part in Paris. Indeed, in those early years admission to the Society was in the nature of a final graduation of the studentship abroad. It is interesting to recall this roll of names, for, although William Morris Hunt and George Inness are absent, it includes practically all the men of the advance guard in that progress which has put American painting in line with the art of other countries. Nearly two-thirds of them are figure-painters, and the product of Academic training. It is this that we have now to consider.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

* * * * *

As we have already seen, the three pioneers in the movement to France—Hunt, La Farge, and Inness—came under influences that existed in antagonism to the Academic teaching. But it was under the latter that the figure-painters of the next generation came. It was natural enough that the great teachers in the official schools should attract them. As Duveneck and Chase at Munich put themselves, respectively, under the famous Diez and Piloty, and Maynard and Millet under Van Lerius at the Academy at Antwerp, so the French students clustered around such eminent masters as Gérôme, Cabanel, Bouguereau, Boulanger, Lefebvre, Bonnat, and Carolus Duran.

The last named stands apart from the others in that he made the actual brushwork rather than the charcoal drawing the foundation of his method. Bonnat also was distinct, because in consequence of his close study of old Spanish painting he had modified his Academic training with a strongly naturalistic tendency. He painted, for example, wonderful portraits in which every inequality of the surface and texture of the flesh was faithfully rendered—marvels of characteristic physiognomy.

FRENCH INFLUENCE

On the other hand, the rest of the masters we have mentioned were neither naturalistic in their motives nor skilful painters in their methods. Their aim was beauty of individual forms and elegance of line in composition; the basis of their method was perfectly finished drawing, to be subsequently coloured. They were not colourists, nor had their brushwork any character of distinction, while matters of light and atmosphere concerned them little. Yet they had not escaped entirely the influence of outside tendencies; for example, they frequently popularised their pictures by giving them a sentimental or anecdotal appeal.

It is no part of our purpose to attempt to show how American students were influenced individually by one or another of these masters, but rather to summarise results. What they acquired, briefly stated, was a precise and scholarly knowledge of the human form in its relation to painting. The crux that confronted them, on returning home to America, was the use to which this knowledge could be put. Those, who at this period or later remained in Paris after the conclusion of their student days, in a measure evaded the issue by devoting themselves to the kind of subjects that were interesting the Frenchmen, and their work became French in feeling and character. But to those figure-painters who returned to America the problem was far more difficult.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

They had returned because their sympathies were with their own country, but the latter offered them little encouragement. Abroad the figure-painters devoted themselves primarily to the representation of the nude; then to classic and historic subjects, or to costume or peasant genre. But in none of these directions was there much opening for the painter in America.

To the American public the nude was scarcely distinguishable from the naked. It had not the familiarity with culture that discovers in the human form the highest symbol of abstract beauty; and two centuries of Puritanical tradition and prejudice had engendered a prudishness that even to-day, while not quite so virulent, is still prevalent and hide-bound. The classics, as a mine of poetic thought and concrete ideals, were equally unfamiliar, while the scope of history had become narrowed down to episodes of the Revolution and the Civil War. Costume subjects smacked of an "effete" aristocracy, while the people over here who correspond to the ouvrier and peasant abroad lacked the latter's individuality. The painter in search of the picturesque found himself confronted with the monotonous uniformity of store clothes, of a public-school average of manners, and of organised labour, regulated by union conventions.

This is how the home conditions appeared to the returning students, and it was not much exaggerated by their imaginations.

FRENCH INFLUENCE

Meanwhile the influx of foreign pictures was increasing, and collectors who would have hesitated to buy a nude, a classical or historical subject, a costume or peasant genre, by an American, invested in the foreign article. For, an investment they considered it, and a safe one, since the foreign painters had received the official indorsement of their own country, in the shape of medals and honours. Such pictures, it was presumed, though in many cases erroneously, would always bring their money back with interest. Moreover, foreign things were the fashion. The Exposition and the return of American students, while they were to be of ultimate benefit to native art, were for the time being a source of impoverishment to the individual artist. He found it difficult to sell his pictures, for the investor-collector was swayed by the argument of the dealers—that, granted the superiority of the foreign article, it was a shrewder speculation to invest in the real thing. And this had a further advantage. It saved the collector's face. The nudes might seem to be shamelessly indecent, the classical subjects completely unintelligible, but they were French, and that covered a multitude of embarrassments. Is it not a fact that one does a lot of things in Paris, that one would not so much as speak of in New York or Philadelphia or Boston? These pictures were French, which at once explained, even if it did not condone, them, and, most important, gave them a caché.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Now, these conditions, distressing enough at the time to individual painters, were on the whole to the advantage of American art. It is true they drove many men to the necessity of seeking a living in illustration rather than in painting, and of forsaking the precariousness of imaginative work for the surer returns of portraiture. They even postponed for nearly twenty years an active demand for figure-subjects; until, in fact, the vogue of mural painting was established. On the other hand, these conditions had their compensations. They headed off any general tendency that might have existed to imitate the motives as well as the methods of the foreigner; brought to the surface such individuality as existed in American figure-painters, and set the current of our art in the direction of expressing what is distinctly American. They helped to bring the painting of the figure in line with that of landscape. For the latter, though gaining reinforcement from abroad, has throughout its course of steady progression been a product and expression of native sentiment. By comparison, the progression of figure-painting has been fitful and uncertain.

* * * * *

Among the few painters who in the 'seventies

ARIADNE

WYATT EATON

*B*EAUTIFUL in drawing and modelling. A product of Munich painting that has not yet felt the effect of open-air light in an open scene.

In the Collection of William T. Evans, Esq.

BENJAMIN R. FITZ

...ining, and, although this figure in its ...being the loveliest nude yet painted in ...have given. The figure, notwithstanding
...not enveloped with lighted atmosphere.

Collection of William T. Evans, Esq.

FRENCH INFLUENCE

and early 'eighties ventured to render the nude in easel pictures, the most notable were B. R. Fitz and Walter Shirlaw, of Munich training, Wyatt Eaton, a pupil of Gérôme, and Elihu Vedder, who studied under Picot in Paris, but derived his real instruction from living in Rome.

The best example by Fitz, The Reflection, represents a girl standing on the edge of a pool, looking down into the water. It has the charm of absolutely unconscious loveliness, and the technical merit of being well drawn and painted. On the other hand, though the figure is shown in the open air, no attempt has been made to render the effects of light and atmosphere. In this it betrays its academic origin, as also do the easel pictures of nudes by Wyatt Eaton and Walter Shirlaw. These represent a riper type of beauty than the girl by Fitz, but the same words of commendation can be given them. Less skilful as a painter, Vedder has far more facility of drawing and a richer imagination than either of the others possessed. His illustrations to the poems of Omar Kháyýám, as well as his easel-pictures and mural paintings, reveal an unusual gift for decorative treatment of line and mass, and a still more unusual gift of original and creative thought. The latter is a rarer quality in painting than in some other branches of art, such as poetry and music, and there have been painters who have tried to cover up their own lack of it by belittling Vedder. They would say that in the strict sense of the term he is not a painter. It is true; but the same might be said of Gérôme, Bouguereau, and Cabanel, and of many of their pupils. The academic method, as we have already observed, is based upon form; the colouring is rather in the nature of a tinting that only approximates to the realities of flesh colour, since it takes little or no account of the action of light upon the surfaces. Vedder takes none whatever, and goes even further in not attempting even an approximation to the local flesh tones. The reason is that painting, as the representation of real appearances, does not interest him; it is for him a symbol of expression; from his point of view the human figure is but a concrete symbol, and his colouring of the figure like his use of it is not realistic but symbolical. His imagination, these critics have insisted, is too "literary." We shall have more to say about this when we discuss a little later the catch-cry of "art for art's sake," which began to be heard in the following decade. At present we will observe that the charge amounts to this—that Vedder has ideas embracing the mysteries of life and death; a store of conceptions formed by experience and reflection and by intimacy with the thoughts of great minds, and has used his art to give expression to them. If his art were weak and overweighted with the thought, there might be some ground for the criticism; but it is not. In fact, the main point of the criticism is that intellectual and imaginative originality is rare among painters, as in other professions, and the man who possesses it is apt to be an offence to some who do not.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

FRENCH INFLUENCE

And here a word may be said upon the subject of what many arbitrarily call the "ideal" picture. It involves the use of the nude or of figures wrapped in draperies, for the most part, supposed to be "classical." This class of motive is based upon the assumption that the painter's duty and privilege is to improve upon the imperfections of the human form and to give the figure an ideal perfection. Therefore the world of real men and women will not do; the painter must invent some fancy of his own. As a rule, he does not so much invent as follow along some well-worn ruts that have led for centuries to the same goal. Here some nymph of antiquity for the thousandth time disposes of her maiden beauty to invite the approach of her divine or human lover; or steps into her bath or emerges therefrom; or beautiful youths and maidens pose themselves in self-admiring groups, or weave their bare limbs and nicely calculated draperies into a rhythmic maze. The innumerable changes rung on these and such like themes have produced some of the most beautiful pictures in the world, but by artists who were nearer to the sources of Classic culture than we are to-day, especially in America. Regarded as a product of ourselves, such modern pictures are at best a graceful affectation; and, as a consequence, reach only a pretty mediocrity. Their influence is even detrimental, so far as they help to foster a wrong conception of the "ideal." In appropriating this attribute exclusively to an aim at material perfection and losing sight of that higher ideal of spiritual and imaginative expression, the modern Academic painter has reduced his art to a condition of inferiority, as compared with music and poetry and even the finer kinds of prose. It is but a more or less elegant make-believe, in a world that is very real. It takes no account of man's higher aspirations and needs, and in its impersonal, unindividual treatment of form runs counter to the individualism and exact study of phenomena, which have become the characteristic of the age. Whereas, in this respect the Academic painter divorces art from life, the trend of the time has been to discover a union of the two.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

* * * * *

With many of our painters, however, the Academic training has been but the prelude to very independent and personal development. Three examples may be quoted. Two of these, George de Forest Brush and Abbott H. Thayer, were pupils of Gérôme, himself a man of intellectuality expressional control of line and mass in imagination; also, in the original, of his while in a general way directly grasped, its significance by confining it within a diverse minds and experiences.

ELIHU VEDDER

Department of the Carnegie Institute, Pittsburgh

[illegible]

✕

FRENCH INFLUENCE

but devoid of imagination. What we may believe they derived from him was a mental discipline and faculty of thought which enabled them to put to entirely independent uses the principles that they learned from him, and ultimately to give free rein to their own imagination.

In Brush's early pictures after his return home the brushwork is trim and sleek and hard, like his master's, and he reflects also the latter's partiality for embodying some story and archæology in his pictures. But as a basis for these qualities Brush did not, like Gérôme, search the Classics or the strange life of the East. His thoughts were toward his own country and what it might yield in the way of motive. He found material for story, archæology, and strangeness in the North American Indians; and food for his imagination by discovering in their present condition a clue to their past. He attempted to recreate the spacious, empty world in which they lived a life that was truly primitive, unmixed with any alloy of the white man's bringing; and to interpret not only the externals of their life, but its inwardness, as with mingled stolidity and naïveté these men-children looked out upon the phenomena of nature, fronted the mystery of death, and peered into the stirrings of their own souls.

In these Indian pictures, far too few in number, Brush still betrayed the tentative technique of the student, for their drawing is tame and the painting constrained and timorous. But the imagination, revealed, is deep and elevated, and no one has approached him in the completeness with which he has suggested the solemn romance of those primitive conditions. In Silence Broken, for example, a goose has burst from a bank of foliage immediately above the head of an Indian in a canoe. One is conscious of the rush of sound, vibrating through the vast isolation. The Indian looks up, but does not cease his paddling; he kneels in the boat, a figure of monumental composure. And here, in Mourning Her Brave, a squaw, muffled in a blanket, stands in the snow on the mountain side chanting a dirge, as she stares dully at the leaden, unrelenting sky. The suggestion is elemental; a note or world-old wailing and protest out of the void of time. Or again, in the Sculptor and the King, the one has wrought upon a block of sandstone, drawing from it some expression of the thought within himself, and now he waits in trembling eagerness for the word of the King. The latter holds himself erect and rigid, with the habit of superiority, but in his mind is embarrassment. This man, his inferior in social standing, has reached out beyond the King's experience and done something that makes royalty itself seem powerless; a strange new thing, a creation. The King is oppressed with wonder.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

THE SCULPTOR AND THE KING

GEORGE DE FORESTER BRUSH

A WISE man of his tribe or, as his tribe may think, a fool in his generation, seeking after vain things, has for the first time fashioned a thought in stone. The king, fountain of authority and strength, comes in judgment and stands in amazed awe.

In the Collection of Miss Henrietta E. Failing wife and children.

GEORGE DE FOREST BRUSH

Academy of Fine Arts, Philadelphia

FRENCH INFLUENCE

One can only touch upon the thought of these pictures. If you have seen them, you will recall the grip which they exert on the imagination, and join in the regret that Brush did not persevere in this line of work until his technical ability had become equivalent to his conceptions. But he abandoned it, anxious, I believe, to paint ideas more close to the experience of everybody, and not uninfluenced, we may suspect, by the claims of family life upon his sympathy. For his theme now became, and has continued to be, his wife and children, painted in the spirit of reverent devotion that characterised the Madonnas of the Old Masters. But with a difference—the interpolation of a modern note of painful seriousness. It is not the happiness of Motherhood that he represents, but the burthen and responsibility of Maternity, a remnant of the rigid strenuousness of Puritanic tendencies. Even in the sweet faces of the children is a foreshadowing of care. Meanwhile the influence of the Madonna motive threw his study back to the old paintings, and his own technique, recalling that of the early Flemish masters, obtained a fulness and dignity that befit the theme. Whenever his pictures appear, they create for themselves an atmosphere of grave distinction.

* * * * *

The same quality, with a superadded note of tenderness, is to be found in the work of Abbott

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Thayer. He, too, has left behind the manner of his master, and acquired one of his own, characterised rather by sincerity than style, for his colour is confused, the brushwork laboured. Nevertheless his pictures move and hold one by the force of their spirituality. They are the expression of very beautiful qualities of personal character, strong, tender, simple.

The girl-figure that haunts his canvases, nobly formed, but free of any cloy of flesh, fronts the world with starlike eyes, serenely fixed beyond the range of common things. She is a vestal virgin, that has in her keeping the spiritual ideal of which she herself is the creation.

Thayer, in fact, has done for the spiritual ideal of American womanhood what Charles Dana Gibson has done for the physical and mundane—created a type. Gibson's, through multiplication of copies and because of its aggressive attractiveness, caught the popular fancy; Thayer's, for exactly opposite reasons, has captivated the imagination only of the few. Gibson's type is sexless, and self-engrossed; Thayer's unconscious of her modesty, self-contained, but tender and unselfish. She is typical of the pure, frank outlook upon life, prepared to accept its responsibilities and renunciations, to lighten its grossness, and uphold a high ideal.

In an age and environment, not overgiven to and Cameron

ABBOTT H. THAYER

Shape of girlhood.

ARBOT H. THAYER

"Love," represented as a maiden, standing guardian over the lives of the world, as Thayer so completely reconciled the classical sentiment of the modern spirit.

The Museum of Fine Arts, Boston

FRENCH INFLUENCE

spirituality and imagination, these pictures are a notable embodiment of both.

* * * * *

From them we may pass very naturally to a study of Thomas W. Dewing's conceptions of woman, as embodied in his pictures. In it also we may find a note distinctly American. For it should be remembered that there are two ways in which a painter may reflect the particularity of his environment. There is, first, the comparatively obvious one of representing the externals; and, secondly, the more subtle one of interpreting the inner nature of the men and women around him.

From an attempt to record the first, as we have already remarked, the earlier home-comers were discouraged, and it cannot yet be said that they or their successors have made considerable contribution to a record of the appearances of American life. Such genre subjects as those of Eastman Johnson, that depict incidents relating to the Civil War, or Thomas Hovenden's Last Moments of John Brown, or Winslow Homer's early pictures of rural scenes in the South, were the product of an earlier influence, that at the period we are discussing was losing its force, even if it had not actually expired. It had been undermined by the influence from abroad; for while the latter had done much to put the student on sure ground as regards technique, it had unsettled his motives. It had held up to him certain motives congenial to the conditions abroad, which, however, he could not find at home, and as a consequence he was embarrassed and at a loss.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

We do not forget that some turned resolutely to the theme of Colonial times. But these pictures of Puritan maidens and the life of the early settlers, by men like C. Y. Turner, George H. Boughton, and Douglas Volk, though charming in many respects, particularly in that of sentiment, are after all the product of fancy; they are not interpretations of American life, as known and studied by the painter. It was the contemporary conditions that this new generation of painters avoided, and that their successors have infrequently and inadequately attempted. Indeed, it is scarcely an exaggeration to say that the only great interpretation of any phase of American conditions is to be found in Winslow Homer's pictures of the fisherfolk of Maine.

On the other hand, in the subtler domain of the spirit the American environment has made itself felt. Its action has been twofold: subjectively affecting the mental attitude of the painter, and objectively offering to his scrutiny certain distinct qualities in the object of his study. We have seen how these results are exhibited in the attitude of Brush and Thayer, respectively, toward maternity and the man's face pretty much ornaments to a picture of smaller no. It is a chunk out of the hanging off the iron coast of Maine.

WINSLOW HOMER

 Museum of Fine Arts, Boston

[illegible]

A large, dense crowd of people gathered for a public event, with a stage and structures visible in the background.

FRENCH INFLUENCE

and maidenhood, and may now study another phase of them in Dewing's rendering of women.

His also betray the inherited trait of seriousness, and are all still the daughters of Puritanism, though many times removed from the original strain. Generations of repressed emotion have made them incapable of passion; strenuousness survives only in supersensitive nerves; their sole religion is the worship of self. From narrow conditions they have emerged into a vision of the Kingdoms of the World and the Glory of them, but have already tasted of satiety. They are motionless in an atmosphere from which all human warmth has been sucked, in a vacuum drained of intellectual and emotional nourishment. These bodily shapes are not of flesh and blood; they are the essence distilled from the withering of what is womanly, the mere fragrance of dead rose-leaves.

It was only by degrees that Dewing evolved this conception. His earlier examples, such as the Lady at the Spinnet, and some of his small portraits, still have a charm that is physical as well as spiritual. The change may have come about through a change in his technical motive, as he became more and more enamoured of the subtleties of colour and lighting, qualities that, we shall see, began to occupy the attention of students during the 'eighties. It is a phase of our story that belongs to a later chapter. We can only say of it here, that to an artist of Dewing's sensibility both of feeling and hand, it offered a possibility of exquisite refinement of style, such as his has become; and that in the refining of his method his typical conception grew to be more and more rarified; less and less concerned with form as form, increasingly occupied with its suggestion of abstract expression.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

In this evolution of motive and method he owed as little to his masters, Lefebvre and Boulanger, as Brush and Thayer did to Gérôme. In each case the individuality of the man gradually declared itself. It took some colour from its native environment and gave back in return an interpretation of something distinctively American in spirit. In the latter respect they are alone among their contemporaries; nor do I know where to look among their successors for any who has done a similar thing. These three men have not exhausted the subject of American womanhood; but, as some of the Florentine sculptors and painters did in the case of the women of the Renaissance, they have represented certain distinct types of contemporary femininity.

We started the chapter with a consideration of the Academic motive, but in following the development of Dewing, especially, have been compelled to wander from it. We may recover our ground by a reference to Edwin A. Abbey, who, though not Paris-trained, is a conspicuous example, almost

LE JASEUR

THOMAS W. DEWING

WIIIIE the coloring presents a web of subtle and subdued harmony, the figures vibrate with a thrill of piquancy. It is interesting to note with what unerring ease the artist has made the movement of the figures and their several kinds of engrossed attention concentrate toward "the chatter-box" on the table.

In the Collection of John Gellatly, Esq.

FRENCH INFLUENCE

the only one we have in modern times, of the Academic principle applied to historic painting.

Born in Philadelphia, in 1852, a pupil of the Pennsylvania Academy, he became a draughtsman in the publishing house of Harper & Brothers. Those were the days of reproduction by wood engraving, and his duty was to draw the picture on the block. Gradually this method was superseded by the mechanical process of photo-engraving, and with this transition, Abbey's career as an illustrator is closely identified. The newer methods offered increased opportunity of originality and skill on the part of the draughtsman, and soon Abbey became known as one of the most original and skilful, especially in the use of pen and ink. His illustrations to "Herrick's Poems" had so much charm of invention and such a sympathy with and insight into the old-time feeling and environment, that he was commissioned by his publishers to go to England and gather material for a series of illustrations of She Stoops to Conquer. This visit proved the turning point of his career. He found in England, not only material for his drawings, but also the mental suggestion and atmosphere that his artistic development craved. He settled in England, married a New York lady, and has since made his home at Morgan Hall, an old manor house at Fairford in Oxfordshire. The success which his work achieved enabled him, without abandoning illustration, to devote a constantly increasing attention to oil painting. In the latter medium he continued the same purposes and characteristics that he had adopted in his illustrations. The basis of the picture is still the subject; an old world one, frequently taken from some scene in Shakespeare's plays.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Like his series of decorations in the Boston Public Library, embodying the story of the "Holy Grail," they are presented with an archæological exactness of costume and accessories, and with much dramatic action and regard for individual characterisation. They are rich in colour, showing a preference for blacks, whites, and scarlet; though it is to be noted that Abbey is only in a limited sense a colourist. To borrow a musical simile, he does not compose the colours in a harmony, but introduces separate melodies of colour, and spots his pictures with these, as a draughtsman with pen and ink spots the blacks and whites in his composition. Indeed, in this respect, as well as because of the importance given to subject and his method of building up his effects for the main purpose of telling the story of the scene, Abbey, while working in oil, still remains an illustrator; upon that larger scale which is distinguished as "historical painting." He is the most important survivor, in fact, of the vogue of the historical subject; and in

TRIAL OF QUEEN KATHERINE

EDWIN A. ABBEY

SHAKESPERE'S "HENRY VIII." Act II, Scene iv ; a Hall in Blackfriars. The moment chosen is when the queen sinks to her knees with the entreaty, "Sir, I desire you, do me right and justice." The canvas illustrates Abbey's dramatic handling of a situation, with its crowd of figures and diverse individualities of character and emotion, as well as his fidelity to archaeological accuracy of costumes and accompaniments. In the original the richness of the coloring adds to the impressiveness of the scene.

In the Collection of the Honorable William A. Clark consequence was selected to paint the official picture of King Edward's Coronation. That vogue has given way before the increased attention paid to the manner of representation, rather than to the subject; to the aim of the modern painter to study his subject at close and intimate range, for which purpose he chooses a simple one, and makes the expression of his picture grow out of the technical expression. These principles, originally learned from the Barbizon painters, have been perpetuated in the steady development of American landscape painting. We will resume, in the next chapter, the thread of these influences during the 'seventies and early 'eighties, noting at the same time some interesting examples of independent growth.

FRENCH INFLUENCE

CHAPTER X

CONTINUANCE OF BARBIZON INFLUENCE AND SOME EXAMPLES OF INDEPENDENCE

IN resuming the story of American landscape, we meet with two men who are usually associated in our mind with George Inness: Alexander H. Wyant and Homer Martin. These three may be reckoned the fathers of modern American landscape. Martin, like Inness, was directly influenced by the Barbizon painters; Wyant indirectly through the example of Inness and of the Barbizon pictures that had reached this country. His artistic career resembled that of Inness, so far as it developed from analysis to synthesis and from the representation of landscape to the rendering of a mood of nature. Otherwise the two men were very different. Inness was versatile, eager, and impulsive, a transcendentalist; Wyant, a lyric poet-painter, in whose mind, as in a still pool, a restricted range of emotions was mirrored, with a suggestion of poignant tenderness and depth.

Wyant was born, in 1836, at Defiance, Ohio. Although as a boy he had the observing eye and the desire to translate into line the forms of things, and, as he grew older, trained himself in drawing, he was twenty years old before he saw any pictures. This opportunity came to him when he visited Cincinnati, and, among the pictures there, one especially attracted him. It was by Inness. It seemed to the young man that one who could paint like that would be able and willing to advise him as to whether he might dare to hope to be an artist. He found means to visit New York, sought out Inness, was most kindly received, and spread out his studies and sketches to await judgment. The verdict was favourable, and Wyant resolved to be an artist.

EXAMPLES OF INDEPENDENCE

He went abroad and studied for a time under the Norwegian painter, Hans Gude, who had graduated from Düsseldorf and was teaching at Karlsruhe. There seems to have been a mutual attachment between master and pupil; but, when the former urged an imitation of his own method of painting, Wyant rebelled.

He returned to America, and being in need of funds, joined a Government expedition to explore the West. Hardships overtook the party; his physical strength was unequal to the strain, and, partially paralysed, he was put on board an eastward train. The train passed through his native town; but he reasoned that, if he succumbed to his condition, he might never again be able to emerge and push forward to his goal of being an artist. So he lay still and reached New York. In time he recovered the use of his body, but his right arm remained affected, and henceforth he painted with the left. Moreover, during the rest of his life he was subject always to bodily discomfort, not infrequently to pain, and there hung over him the realisation that his days were numbered. He worked under the intense concentration of feeling that he had so much he wished to do, so little time in which to do it. The remainder of his life, which he shared with a devoted wife and a few friends, Inness pre-eminently among them, he gave to the study of nature, finding companionship all along in the nature-poet, Wordsworth. He worked first in the Adirondacks; then, fearing that he might fall into a mannerism by continuing to represent scenes of similar character, moved to the Catskills. His development, influenced by the Barbizon paintings, that were being imported in increasing numbers, and by the example of Inness, was from analysis to synthesis, from the representation of external nature to the interpretation of a mood. His earlier pictures are marvels of precise mastery of characterisation. By degrees they become broader, simpler, more single-minded, or shall I call it single-hearted? For their emotional quality increased until they become the intense expression of a mood—the artist's own feeling, interpreted through nature. And the mood grows to be one of absorbing love and loveliness, frequent with sadness, musical lyrics in a minor key.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

ALEXANDER H. WYANT to reproduce, is characterized by a and exceedingly delicate quality of

In the collection of William T. Evans, Esq.

A large, dense crowd of people gathered for a protest or demonstration. Many individuals are holding up mobile phones to record the event. The crowd is diverse in age and appearance, and the overall atmosphere appears to be one of organized public expression.

EXAMPLES OF INDEPENDENCE

Throughout his life he was a student, and when he was conscious that the end was drawing near (it came in 1892), he would exclaim: "Had I but five years more in which to paint, even one year, I think I could do the thing I long to."

This is the cry of a true artist, one whose soul was set upon that most evanescent, intangible quality—expression, while his hands were hampered by a medium comparatively clumsy and hard to manage. To others it will seem that he reached achievement; to himself, conscious of what he longed to do, there remained to the end a royal discontent.

* * * * *

In great contrast to Wyant's tender, poignant lyricism, and to the brilliant improvisation of Inness, is the profound seriousness of Homer Martin's work. To his club-mates he was a "fellow of infinite jest," big-natured in his weakness as in his strength; in the seclusion of his art, a painter of grave purposes and serious imaginings.

He was born at Albany, New York, in 1836, the year also of Wyant's birth. Except for a few weeks' instruction from William Hart he was self-taught, and his early work represents a groping of mind and hand, a searching after the thing that was worth doing and some way of doing it. Already, however, it was distinguished by a feeling for colour and expression. He had always been subject to a weakness of the eyes, which debarred him from admission into the army at the opening of the Civil War, and had a marked influence upon the tenor of his art.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

There is no doubt that what we recognise in an artist as a mental idiosyncrasy has frequently originated in some defect or peculiarity of ocular vision; for it is how the artist sees the visible world that will determine how the impression, filtered through his mind, will appear in the picture. Now Martin's imperfection caused him to see nature in mass, not enclosed in sharp outlines; and since crispness and definiteness were a characteristic of such landscape pictures as he had at first the opportunity of seeing, he distrusted himself. Had he known that Corot, after a long apprenticeship to certainties of form, had deliberately brought himself to see nature as a pattern of masses, softened against the spaces of the sky; that this was a phase of the process which other artists were going through in their passage from the analytical to the synthetical method of representing nature, he would have been saved much distress and delay. He might have realised the fact, so frequently illustrated in art, and to be exhibited later in his own, that it is out of a man's weakness that his peculiar strength is evolved. But it was not until after he had been abroad that impressions which he had hesitated to accept became convictions, upon which he could effectually base his self-development.

EXAMPLES OF INDEPENDENCE

His first visit was in 1876, to Holland, England, and France, with a short stay at Barbizon. Again in 1881 he went to England, renewing a friendship with Whistler that had been commenced five years before; and thence moved across the Channel to Villerville, a little village near Harfleur in Normandy, where nineteen months were spent. It was during this time that he gathered the impressions which later resulted in some of his finest works—Low Tide at Villerville, Honfleur Lights, Cinque-boeuf Church, known now as Old Church in Normandy; Normandy Trees, Normandy Farm, the Sun Worshippers, and the landscape in the Metropolitan Museum called, erroneously, a View on the Seine. The Mussel Gatherers was completed a little later at Harfleur.

It is characteristic of Martin's habit of work that his stay at Villerville, the happiest incident of his career, was a period not of productivity, of giving out, but of taking in impressions, to be realised later. It may have been an instinct for saving his eyes that deterred him from making the colour studies or drawings in the open air with which painters usually equip themselves for subsequent work in the studio. One picture, Westchester Hills, which many people consider his masterpiece, was painted from start to finish in the open air; but this was a single exception to his rule of work. His numerous sketches are little more than summary indications of the anatomy of a scene—its lines and masses, jotted down with a pencil or water-colour brush. His real studies of nature were made through half-closed eyes, as he lay or sat smoking, apparently doing nothing. But all the time he was absorbing facts and receiving impressions. These gradually took shape and arrangement in his brain, until he obtained a mental vision of his subject; and it was the memory of the latter that occupied his attention when subsequently he came to paint the picture.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

In "A Reminiscence" of her husband Mrs. Martin testifies to this, which is of extreme interest in helping one to understand his work. Incidentally I may remind the reader that it was in this way that many of Corot's most beautiful pictures had their beginning. They were painted in Paris from impressions stored up by the artist during the summer time in Ville d'Avray, as he watched the rising of the sun, or saw it to its setting. As with Corot, it was not the landscape but the impression of a mood experienced in himself at nature's suggestion, that Martin painted. And we have it on Mrs. Martin's authority, and may find corroboration in the titles of two of his pictures, that the mood was not only an abstract sensation, but that the concrete image of the mood was present to his

WESTCHESTER HILLS

HOMER D. MARTIN

I*T is twilight ; the sky quivering with milky whiteness, the greens and yellows of the hill and foreground already browned over with the dusk. Nature is gathering herself to rest ; she breathes slowly and placidly ; in a few moments she will be asleep. This picture, by many regarded as the artist's finest work, is said to be the only one that he began and finished in the open air.*

In the Collection of Daniel Guggenheim, Esq.

EXAMPLES OF INDEPENDENCE

imagination. Thus, the View on the Seine was called by himself The Harp of the Winds. The scene had suggested music to him, and the tall poplar stems and their reflections seemed like strings vibrating with the quiver of the foliage. But Martin feared that the title might seem to be sentimental, and, abandoning it, changed also the appearance of the trees, in order, I suppose, that the resemblance to a harp might not be too obvious. For he had a great horror of painting anything that might be suspected of a literary motive, and in the titles of his pictures avoided giving any verbal clue to the mood embodied. The only other exception is The Fire Worshippers; but I believe it is the exception that proves the rule.

For the appearance of these trees, stunted and bent over by the rigour of the wind, extending their lean and withered arms toward the glory of the setting sun, gives a certain obviousness to the title, when once the humour of the artist's imagination has started the suggestion. But under the obviousness of the title he may have desired to conceal his deeper mood. In the contrast between the splendour of the sky and the cramped, thwarted conditions upon earth, he may well have felt a symbol of the artist's dream of what he longs to do and of the impotence with which he frequently knows himself to be possessed.

For Martin could only work when the impulse was upon him. "I do not know where the impulse comes from," he once said, "nor why it stays away. All I know is that when it comes I can do nothing but paint; and when it goes away I can do nothing but dawdle." "That was absolutely true; and," his wife adds, "it was also very inconvenient." She gives another hint to the understanding both of the man and the artist when she says that Martin was himself a bit of nature.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Without early education, and despite a desultory appreciation of good literature and a taste for music, unregulated by any sort of intellectual discipline, he remained in a very special and unusual way a child of nature; subject to variableness of mood, reckless of consequences. This was the man—a child. It was only the artist in him that grew up and matured; knit by bonds of serious tenderness to the mother earth, from whose loins he had come, and at whose breast he fed, understanding her voice by instinct, while her heart throbbed to the movement of his own. In a word, he did not absorb nature and then pass it through the prism of his own consciousness, as Inness and Wyant did, and most poetic landscape painters do, but himself passed into nature, and became once more conceived in her, afterwards employing the strength of his intellect to express, as it were, the secrets of the womb. Through this rather fantastical process of thinking, I believe, we can gain

THE FIRE WORSHIPERS

HOMER MARTIN

THE reproduction fails to suggest adequately the golden glory of the evening sky and the softness of the silhouettes of the brownish trees. Hence it misses somewhat the suggestion of the original, as of time-tired creatures, warped by fate, bending in adoration and supplication before the majesty of the universal.

In the Collection of Louis Marshall, Esq.

EXAMPLES OF INDEPENDENCE

a perception of what it is in Homer's finest pictures that moves one so largely and so profoundly. It is the completeness with which he was able to surrender himself to nature that made him able to recover from her the elemental feeling, and to render it in a manner at once so large, simple, and profound.

His work is characterised by the qualities of the colourist. In the earliest pictures there is more than a little gaudiness of colour; but this passes with the work of his maturity into a sober harmony of low-toned hues, grave, sonorous, and musically subtle; the earth-parts kneaded into solidity, the skies thrilling with vibration. The sky, however, in the Fire Worshippers is aflame with colour; and again, in the last of all his pictures, Adirondack Scenery, he indulged in a profusion of bright tints. Though blind of one eye and threatened with cataract in the other, irreparably shattered in health, he nevertheless asserted once more the unfaltering jollity of the man in an artist's colour scheme of gaiety. He died in St. Paul, Minnesota, in 1896.

* * * * *

While the three men we have been discussing were influenced more or less directly by the Barbizon painters, their pictures bear no resemblance to the latter's. Henry W. Ranger, however, painted for a while in a manner that is visibly reminiscent, now of Rousseau, now of Diaz; Robert

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

C. Minor, a pupil of the latter, was noticeably representative of Barbizon choice and treatment of subjects. He is dead, and Ranger has discovered a style personal to himself. In fact, this early Barbizon influence has run its course, and been replaced, as we shall see, by another, in which, through the example of Manet and the other "Impressionists," a closer and more scientific study of light is the main motive. Meanwhile, the salient features of the influence are perpetuated. Our landscape painters still select a fragment of nature, study it intimately, summarise its details into an ensemble, and represent it as a portrait of character and expression.

It will be convenient to mention here those men of remarkable originality, whose development was apart from the influence we have been discussing. Entirely self-taught and detached from this influence, except in so far as it was in the air, and no one could escape some recognition of it, Ralph A. Blakelock remained a curiously isolated figure. The son of a New York physician, born in 1847, he would not follow in his father's profession, but determined to divide his studies between music and painting. In neither did he receive any instruction, and prepared himself for painting by a trip to the West, where he lived among the Indians and secured material that he afterwards introduced into

RALPH A. BLAKELOCK

...not inspired him, but he was not
...sure he transposed into a con-
...purpose of emotional expression.

...of Catholina Lambert, Esq.

ALBERT P. RYDER

manner, the whole conception and rendering patterning of the tree-forms, the massing of been arbitrarily assembled for the purpose of

In the Collection of Sir William Van Horne

EXAMPLES OF INDEPENDENCE

his pictures. He was a born colourist, and such men are usually musical, while the musician is conscious of colour-quality in sound. Indeed, the modern mind, in its subtle analysis of sensations, has added to the expressiveness of language by using interchangeably the terminology of these two arts. Thus, having by habit ceased to regard it as an affectation, we find, on the contrary, a usefulness and propriety in speaking, for example, of harmonies and tones of color, high key and low key of colour, and so on; similarly of shading of expression in music, of richness of colour and the like. Both sensations reach us by wave movements, and we may recognise a certain correspondence in the way in which they affect us. But Blakelock went further than a mere consciousness of correspondence, and worked out for his own use a chromatic scale of colour equivalent to that of music.

Unfortunately he had never learned the manual trick of painting, and in the details, notably the foliage, used his brush as a pencil, without, apparently, having acquired the trick of drawing. His trees are as hard, flat, and motionless, and often as dark and opaque in colour, as if cut out of japanned tin. Accordingly, considered as portraits of nature, they are unsatisfactory. But this is not the proper way to regard them. Rather they are pictorial arrangements founded upon a theme which he has borrowed from nature; as a musical composer may take some simple folk-tune and use it as the slender thread on which to string his harmonious inventions. If we will divest our minds for a moment of the habit of looking in a landscape for an intimate study of nature, and estimate Blakelock's simply as pictorial convention, a symphony of colour based upon nature motif, intended to affect us in a purely abstract way, we shall find the best of them extraordinarily original and inspiring.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

* * * * *

This is also the best way to estimate the work of another isolated figure, Albert P. Ryder, although he himself is apt to confuse the issue by giving his pictures titles that have a literary suggestion. Among his subjects, for example, will be remembered Jonah and the Whale, Siegfried, Temple of the Mind, Flying Dutchman. This literary allusion is a source of weakness in his pictures. Their real strength consists in the way in which he makes the rendering of the landscape a pattern of colour and form, full of emotional appeal, or the ocean and sky contribute to a symphony of colour; in the Jonah as wild and whirling, as a Hungarian Gipsy dance by torchlight, in the Flying Dutchman as weird as the squealing flight of witches. With no thought of nature in his mind, but intent on making every part of the picture beautiful in colour and texture, he embroiders every inch of the canvas, as

THE FLYING DUTCHMAN

ALBERT RYDER

ATUMULT of water, in the trough of which is a small boat with a few shipwrecked sailors. Beyond them passes the phantom ship, her sails confused with the sweep of cloud that hovers over the setting sun. The emotional suggestion of the picture is mainly the result of the color-scheme, a turbulence of gold-flecked splendor.

THE JOURNAL OF
THE ROYAL ANTHROPOLOGICAL
INSTITUTE OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND
VOLUME
LXXV
PART I 1905
PUBLISHED BY THE
INSTITUTE
21, BEDFORD SQUARE, LONDON, W.C.1
PRINTED BY
HARRISON AND SONS, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C.2

EXAMPLES OF INDEPENDENCE

if his brush were a needle, threaded with brilliant silks or strands of gold and silver, until the whole gleams like precious stones. All this is beautiful, very beautiful, pregnant with imagination.

Ryder has been likened to Monticelli, but scarcely with justice to the latter. For the Frenchman was a master in the rendering of light; his pictures are saturated with it; nay, more, they are constructed in light, creations of light; the figures moving or fixed in lighted atmosphere. Ryder's pictures are usually opaque, and radiant on their surfaces alone. But there is another fundamental difference—a racial one. Monticelli's pictures are creations of pure fancy, while Ryder exhibits the Anglo-Saxon tendency to supplement the music with ideas, and his literary additions are singularly ineffectual. The little figures, boats, fish, and architecture, appear ill-drawn, ill-placed, and curiously childish in conception, and suggest that their author has nothing of the saving grace of humour. His work, notwithstanding its emotional charm, gives the impression of its author being too much pre-occupied with his own seriousness.

* * * * *

The third of the independents, George Fuller, belongs to a generation earlier than that of Ryder and Blakelock, having been born in 1822, three years before the birth of Inness. Yet it was not until 1876 that the work by which he is now remembered was presented to the public gaze. It had been produced under circumstances that render his career a chapter of romance in the story of American painting, and a very unusual variation on the theme of "art for art's sake."

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Up to 1859 it was not unlike the careers of other painters in those days of limited opportunity. Some instruction at home in Deerfield, Massachusetts, where his father was a farmer, was gained from a half-brother who had skill as a miniature-painter; later, a little instruction in drawing from the sculptor, Henry Kirke Brown, in Albany, and further help from another sculptor, John Ball. Portraits occupied him principally, though he made some efforts to break away from them and indulge himself in imaginative subjects. In 1857 he was elected an associate of the National Academy. The most notable feature of this period of his life was the determination he made, as expressed in a letter to his friend Brown: "I have concluded," he wrote, "to see nature for myself, through the eye of no one else, and put my trust in God, awaiting the result."

In 1859 the tenor of his life was changed by the death of his father and elder brother. In the interest of the younger children—his mother had died some years previously—his presence was needed on the farm. But before settling down he realised the long-cherished hope of visiting Europe.

THE WOOD GUTTERS

By Courtesy of N. E. Mendroose

HORATIO WALKER

A FINE rendering of the characteristic action of the two bodies, the one about to pull, the other to push. The picture is filled with light, that strikes sharply on the edges and surfaces of the freshly cut wood and penetrates the shadows.

In the Collection of the Museum of Fine Arts, St. Louis

EXAMPLES OF INDEPENDENCE

In London he made the acquaintance of Rossetti and Holman Hunt; passed on to Paris, and thence travelled from one to another of the principal cities of Belgium, Holland, Germany, and Italy, making sketches in the galleries, and being attracted especially by the works of the Colourists and Rembrandt.

Then he returned home, and went to work as a farmer; and for nearly sixteen years passed out of the ken of both makers and buyers of pictures. Only a few friends knew that in the intervals of superintending the farm he found time to paint; with no thought of selling or exhibiting his pictures, intent simply on trying to express some ideal of his own. It is likely that he would have continued in this voluntary seclusion had not a failure of his tobacco crop brought him to the verge of bankruptcy and compelled him to put some of his pictures on sale in Boston. They were received with acclamation, and during the eight remaining years of his life—he died in 1884—Fuller resumed his career as a professional painter.

He had determined to see nature for himself, and he saw it through the medium of his imagination, veiled with mist. Behind it, the landscape glimmers with subtle colours; the outlines of the figures are indistinct, their motionless forms scintillate with suppressed light; their large eyes gaze fixedly, as if trying to pierce the veil.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

All these pictures, among the best of which may be reckoned The Turkey Pasture, Winifred Dy-sart, The Romany Girl, have a quality of distinction, due particularly to the rare quality of the feeling that inspires them. They are expressions of a singularly beautiful condition of soul. Considered, however, purely as painting, they are less satisfactory. In undertaking the technical problem of rendering light and atmosphere he anticipated what we shall see became a motive of the next generation, but, in comparison with modern pictures, his own lack elasticity and clarity of colour. He stood on the threshold of the New Movement, peering, like one of his own figures, through the veil.

It is this New Movement that is now to engross our attention.

HORATIO WALKER

The Landing of Orleans in the St. Lawrence at French settlers, have preserved of their forefathers. Walker's comprehension, is distinguished turns splendid and subtle.
 eran Gallery of Art, Washington

THOMAS EAKINS

and the "Lesson in Anatomy."

Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia

CHAPTER XI

FRENCH INFLUENCE CONTINUED: REALISM AND IMPRESSIONISM

AT the conclusion of the previous chapter we spoke of the New Movement. It led up finally to the wedding of art with life, which, as we have more than once noted, was to be the characteristic achievement of the nineteenth century.

We have seen already what the painters of Barbizon did to accomplish this, and how their influence set the course of American landscape on a firm road that has led alike to truth and to spiritual expression. We have now to trace the corresponding development in the domain of figure painting. It is true that Millet had already done for the figure what Rousseau and the other Barbizon painters had done for landscape. He had reconciled what the Academicians regarded as contradictory—art and nature. But, as yet, he was little known outside of Barbizon. It was necessary that someone of more belligerent spirit should carry the war of realism into the enemy's stronghold—into Paris. The man of the hour was Gustave Courbet.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

The reader may be reminded that in France the realistic movement was represented in literature by Flaubert, Daudet, the brothers Goncourt, and Zola. It was reflected in painting by Courbet. The latter, as early as 1855, had thrown down the gage of battle to the Academicians, proclaiming himself a realist, asserting that it was a ridiculous presumption for an artist to paint what he had never seen, that his province is limited to what is visible to the eye, and that it is the familiar facts of life with which he ought to be concerned. Courbet had passed off the stage before the later generation of American students reached Paris, but his turbulent personality had given an impulse to the Realistic movement that was carried forward by others. It even affected the Academy, Gérôme, for example, varying subjects of classic motive with the rendering of actual incidents; while Bonnat, who, as we have seen, had early imbibed the naturalistic tendencies of the old Spanish School, became a conspicuous instance of exact and analytical study. His portraits of men, by reason of their intense objective rendering of the external characteristics, are also, so far as the latter indicate what is below the surface, extraordinary representations of human personality. Of both these men Thomas Eakins was a pupil, and he stands out among our painters as at once the most analytical in his observation and the most representative of the influence of the Realistic movement upon the Academic training.

REALISM

Born at Philadelphia in 1844, he passed from the schools of the Pennsylvania Academy to the studios of Gérôme and Bonnat, and came back with an eye trained to precise observation, and a hand skilled in precision of drawing. In these particulars he is a master; beyond them he has shown no disposition to travel; he is as coldly and dispassionately analytical as Gérôme at his strongest, as unflinchingly exact as Bonnat. Under the former's influence he produced his masterpiece, which is owned by Jefferson College, Philadelphia. As Rembrandt, in his Lesson in Anatomy, portrayed the celebrated surgeon, Dr. Tulp, so Eakins has commemorated the personality of Professor Gross in this picture, representing a Surgical Clinic. It involves an effectively artistic composition, as well of lines and masses as of light and shade, and fine characterisation in the individual figures, but the inherent power of the picture is the product of the artist's own point of view.

He approached the incident in precisely the same kind of condition of mind as the surgeons engaged in the operation. The patient, for the time being at any rate, is but a "subject," toward which their attitude of mind is absolutely impersonal, but on which they concentrate all their knowledge and skill, so that their own personality declares itself masterfully in a complete control of the situation.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Equally objective are the portraits of men by Eakins, which represent a similarly impersonal point of view toward the sitter, and in his best ones an extraordinary display of the artist's own personality in his grip of the technical problems of the picture. One of the most remarkable examples is the Portrait of Louis N. Kenton; a lean, shambling figure, with the hands thrust into the waist-pockets of the trousers; the strong, intellectual head bowed in meditation. It suggests that the man has been pacing up and down the room, thinking out some matter, and has suddenly halted, all alert, as he finds himself near to its solution. It is a picture that in its matter-of-factness and in its disregard of the elegancies of line, and of the persuasiveness of colour and tone, might be charged with ugliness, but as the record of a human individual is extraordinarily arresting and satisfactory. Considered from the more general standpoint of a work of art, it might be the better for some of those tricks of grace in which our young students nowadays are drilled to be proficient. Let us grant it, but with the amendment, that here is an instance where a picture may be superior to a mere work of art; that there is in Eakins a capacity broader and deeper than that of simply being an artist. He has the qualities of manhood and mentality that are not too conspicuous in American painting.

REALISM

* * * * *

They appear again in Winslow Homer, the painter of the Ocean. He is our greatest exponent of Realism, with nothing, however, of the Academician in his make-up. Rather, one may see in him some traces of the Barbizon influence, and of other later influences yet to be described; but in the main he is a painter who has worked out for himself his own development.

Independence has been the ruling characteristic of his life. He began his career as an assistant in a lithographic shop in Boston, and there acquired a distaste for doing things according to the dictates of other people. The Civil War broke out, and the Harpers offered him a position as their illustrator at the front. He refused to bind himself by any contract, but joined the Army of the Potomac, and thence sent back to the office drawings of such incidents of camp life as caught his eye and interest, which appeared regularly in "Harper's Weekly." At the same time he practised oil-painting, and at length produced a picture to which the stirring emotions of the time lent a considerable popularity. In this Prisoners from the Front he represented a batch of Confederate troops passing to the rear through groups of Union soldiers. After the war he remained for a time in the South, painting rural scenes, especially of negro life. They reveal a keenness of observation and a certain straightforward method of representation, but are not yet essentially the work of a painter, nor of any considerable artistic merit. To-day they are chiefly interesting as evidence of their author's resolute intention to see and express things in his own way.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

The turning point in his career was reached when he transferred his studies to the characteristics of the Maine coast. There the big, simple heroism of the fishermen and their womenfolk at once attracted him, and prompted a number of pictures, the very titles of which tell their own direct tale. In the Life Line, Undertow, Danger, Eight Bells, All's Well, and others he had caught the spirit of the life; the tragedy that underlies its faithful routine of duty; the unconscious bigness of it all, as Kipling did in his word-picture of the Gloucester fishermen in "Captains Courageous." To Homer the study of this life meant the enlargement of his own; a deepening of his motive, the gradual realisation of his own power as an artist.

Already these pictures are big work; big in their sympathy with and comprehension of the subject of his study. They were to be succeeded by work that was even bigger, because the interest that impelled it and the impression it produces is more abstract, of a more universal kind. For, it was no longer the ocean, mainly as a background to the

THE WEST WIND

WYNBLOW HOMER

DRIER sand-dunes and green sea, swollen white and lashed into spray; a laden sky, and, facing the turmoil of the elements, a solitary figure. The picture represents a fragment of the ocean's epic.

In the Collection of Samuel Untermyer, Esq.

REALISM

human tragedy, but the might and majesty of the ocean itself, that now attracted him supremely. Figures may be introduced, but only as a musician employs a theme in the composition of his fugue; and oftentimes the sole subject of contemplation is the ocean itself. In daily companionship with it, he has led for many years a solitary life upon a spit of coast near Scarboro. Its wild purple and brown rocks, the grey-green seething sea, and the immense skies, laden with wind and moisture, have been his constant and sole inspiration. Their solemn grandeur has entered into his soul, and the work which it has inspired is without any rival in American art for originality and impressiveness.

* * * * *

But the Realism for which Courbet contended was only a transitional phase of the Realistic movement. While it achieved an accuracy of form, it failed to render accurately the colour of form, and its true appearance as affected by light and atmosphere. In this further contribution to realistic painting Manet was the leader, and he drew his inspiration from Velasquez. It has so profoundly affected the painter's point of view and method that it must be comprehended by everyone who would understand the general trend of modern painting, and its particular bias in America. For it was enthusiasm for this new teaching that characterised the students who returned home in the late 'eighties and early 'nineties; and while some of them for a time displayed the extravagance of neophytes, the principles for which they stood have prevailed.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

To state the matter as briefly as possible, the recovery of Velasquez, dating from 1857, gradually brought about the following changes:

Firstly, it affected the painter's way of seeing things. It substituted for a realism of observation such as is recorded by the camera, a painter's way of seeing; for a detailed analysis, a pictorial synthesis or summary. It was realised that Velasquez painted what he could see, not what he knew was present to his eyes. Meissonier, for example, in painting a charge of cavalry, because he knew that every horse had bit and bridle and buckles, every rider sundry buttons on his uniform, represented all and each with microscopic fidelity. Velasquez, on the contrary, making his eyes the standard, took in the figure, or scene, as a whole, with swift comprehensive glance, and then rendered the impression he had received. Following his example, the moderns began to paint "impressions," to be, as the phrase was coined, "impressionists." *

Secondly, it affected a change in the way painters regarded colour and their manner of lay-

* This original significance of the term impressionist, we shall find, was subsequently modified. See page 266.

SERGEANT KENDALL.

with a sharpness of vision that seems atmosphere, yet he comprehends the sentiment in his pictures always

REALISM

ing on the paint. Velasquez's subdued harmonies of blacks and greys, sparingly relieved with yellows, blues, and old rose, opened their eyes to the fascination of subtleties, as compared with the brilliance of strongly contrasted tints. The long, sweeping contours of his figures promoted a taste for the dignity of simple lines and massy compositions. His manner of relieving the monotony of the large coloured masses—black, grey, or otherwise—by breaking them into several tones, and giving them a character of distinction through the broad and virile handling of a brush, loaded with paint, taught the value at once of subtlety and of effective craftsmanship. It made it clear that the brush and not the crayon was the tool to be relied upon, and gave an impetus to the art of painting, as distinguished from the art of drawing a figure and subsequently tinting it.

Thirdly, the extraordinarily natural appearance of Velasquez's figures and scenes, summed up by Gautier when in front of the Maids of Honour he exclaimed, "Where is the picture?" set the painters to discovering its secret. It was found to be due to the fact that Velasquez placed his figures, as they appeared in nature, within a surrounding envelope of lighted atmosphere; and that his method of doing so had been the accurate rendering of the exact amount of light given off from every visible part of the figure or object represented. So now the painters, coining a new word to explain their intentions, began to occupy themselves with "values."

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

To sum up: these discoveries effected the emancipation of painting from the thralldom of Academic draughtsmanship. It restored the actual craftsmanship of the brush to an honourable standing, and gave the painter thereby an opportunity of developing and exhibiting his individuality. You may recognise a man's brushwork as you can another's handwriting. Further, it changed the method of painting. For now, instead of making an elaborate drawing of the figure, accurately shaded, and then laying on the paint with a careful, almost timorous intention not to lose touch with the original drawing, the painter, satisfied with a preliminary sketch that merely indicates the general form and its position on the canvas, builds up his figure from the start by successive layers of paint, so as to reproduce the successive planes of lighted surface which the figure presents. It is a vigorous method, but yet it admits of the fullest amount of subtlety of observation and representation. It involves also a much more realistic as well as vigorous rendering of the subject—an immense step in the direction of effecting a union of art and life.

From the beginning of the 'sixties this method of painting spread, until it has become a usual practice of painters and the basis of instruction for

ALLEN B. TALCOTT

*Connecticut River, near Lyme.
The vigorous aspects of nature and the moods of atmospheric change.*

JOHN S. SARGENT

ly conceptions of femininity. The pink, and the whole color-scheme, was the exquisiteness of a morsel of students. While Manet and many others influenced the vogue by their example, Carolus-Duran was the first and most distinguished of the regular teachers of it. His most important pupil, at any rate from the point of view of the present story, was John S. Sargent, whose work is in an eminent degree representative of what the most skilful of our modern portrait-painters are doing.

REALISM

~ ~ ~ ~ ~

Of New England stock, the son of a physician who had retired from practice in Philadelphia, John Singer Sargent was born in 1856, in Florence, where his boyhood and youth were spent. Brought up amid the advantages of cultured home-life and of early and constant familiarity with the artistic treasures of that beautiful city, he learned to draw and paint at the local Academy of Fine Arts. He was already skilful beyond the average of students and grounded in knowledge of great art and trained in taste, by the time that he went to Paris to study under Carolus-Duran. Having rapidly assimilated that master's teaching, he visited Madrid and studied Velasquez in the Prado, and afterwards moved to Holland, where the portraits of Hals attracted him. Later he was influenced by those of the Scottish artist, Raeburn. His style is a brilliant epitome of these various sources of technical inspiration.

Instead, however, of trying to trace his particular obligation to each of these, it may be more practically useful to attempt a summary of what characterises his own style. Its charm is a combination of vivid impressions and of extraordinarily vital and effective technique.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

As becomes a student of Velasquez, what he paints is the impression that the subject produces on his mind. It would seem as if the impression were generally one that had been immediately registered; but, even if he has had to wait for it, by the time it reaches him, it does so with such vividness that it appears to have all the freshness of immediacy. On rare occasions, however, his portraits are laboured and incompletely realised; it is then, we may conjecture, that he has failed to receive a strong impression.

As a rule, his portraits reveal no psychological analysis, or poetry of feeling, nor, except possibly in some of his portraits of children, any sympathy with the subject. Dispassionate as a mirror, for the most part, with equal fidelity and, at times, relentlessness, his mind reflects the surface characteristics of his sitter, the mannerisms of expression, evidence of social or professional caste, the individualities of dress and gesture, suggestions of temperament and of the atmosphere in which the person moves. No painter of the present day can better render the elegance of fashionable femininity. But while he revels in the opportunity of

BEATRICE

JOHN S. SARGENT

the most beautiful, Sargent ordinarily apart from his the little subject amounting ance and virility it is painted, the wantiness of the costume is usualness of the composition.

JOHN S. SARGENT

in Museum (1890-1902), the collection enriched, is one of Sargent's greatest

Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York

REALISM

luxurious display, he is never carried away by it. It interests him as a problem for his brush. Consciously he never flatters, unconsciously he may sometimes do less than justice; sometimes also he fails to secure a likeness, for it is not as an individual, but as a type, that the sitter chiefly interests him.

As a matter of fact, his main interest is in his technique, and in the artistic problem that the subject offers. Because of this he is often, perhaps generally, puzzling to the public, and appreciated best by brother craftsmen, who speak of him as a "painter's painter." Knowing the difficulties of painting, they are alike astonished and enthusiastic at the audacity with which he attacks a problem, and at the masterful ease with which he solves it. Not that this is always the product of a magical facility, but often of exacting self-criticism, indomitable perseverance, and patient renewal of effort. Again and again, if necessary, he will scrape out, until he has realised his intention, by which time the labour of endeavour will have disappeared in the triumph of achievement. The latter, to speak of it in untechnical language, is characterised by a maximum of suggestion and a minimum of apparent means, the latter thrilling with animation.

As to the suggestion. When a painter copies exactly what he sees in front of him, as, for example, Meissonier did, and our own John G. Brown, you can peer into the canvas at close range and find every detail rendered with minute finish. But that is not how we view people in real life; we do not step close up to them and peer into their faces and scrutinise every particle of their costumes. We watch them from a little distance off, and get a general impression of their personality and appearance. It is this that Sargent strives to give us. When you are close to one of his canvases you are confronted with a number of bold dabs or sweeping strokes of paint that to the inexperienced eye convey no meaning: but step back, so as to gain, as it were, a perspective, and those dabs and patches resolve themselves into modelling of features and hands, and the delineation of draperies and accessories. But, admitting it is so, you may ask in what consists the advantage of this method? The answer involves a psychological consideration, that this process demands a greater exercise of mentality on the part of both artist and spectator.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

The exact imitation of a button gives you no more mental excitement than the original button would. Skill and patient precision were required to manufacture the original, and the same qualities, carried perhaps a little farther, were employed on its imitation; and, while we may exclaim, "How wonderful!" we do so because the wonder is that anyone could have such extraordinary patience. In-

JOHN S. SARGENT

of Dr. William H. Welch, Dr. ler, and Dr. Howard A. Kelly. end of brown woodwork is not very here. In the reproduction it is stretched and the photograph on Johns Hopkins University

IRVING R. WILES

Artist's brilliant and yet refined spontaneous pose of the figure, tender expression.

REALISM

stead of stimulating the mind, it makes us tired to think of it; just as we have to disguise our boredom when a person insists on telling us every petty detail of some occurrence that to start with was not of much account. On the other hand, to analyse, as Sargent does, a certain effect, so absolutely that the essential of it is discovered, and then to determine just how that essential may best be rendered, and out of many possible methods to select unerringly the precise one which will put his mental conception into immediate shape—this represents a keen and vigorous mental exercise, the magnetism of which, if we study his work, will stimulate us. Moreover, since, as a rule, in the finished picture each stroke is there as it came hot and straight from his constructive imagination, the whole subject has the thrill of life. And this, you will observe, is something more than being life-like.

Sargent's eminence has had a great influence upon American painting. On the one hand, it has helped to popularise the new method of painting, and, on the other, to foster the idea that masterfulness of technique may justify a lack of ability or inclination to penetrate the character of the sitter. For, like Carolus-Duran, he is a brilliant exponent of the material and mundane, for the most part engrossed in his impression of externals.

* * * * *

It is the purpose of this story to summarise results, and therefore it may be convenient to divide American portraiture into two classes.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Omitting from our present review a good many portraits which simply represent more or less honest mediocrity, we may sum up the more conspicuously skilful ones as either portraits of esprit or portraits of character. The former with us, as elsewhere, are in the majority. They are distinguished by manifest dexterity of brushwork and by animated and piquant rendering of the sitter's exterior and of such hints of personality as lie near the surface and are expressed by individual mannerisms. The best of such portraits are those of women, which permit the added charm of attractive costumes and of surroundings that are pervaded with the atmosphere of refined elegance. We have elsewhere spoken of portraits of this kind by Chase, and may supplement them by the examples of Irving R. Wiles, J. J. Shannon, Cecilia Beaux, Adelaide Cole Chase, and Frank W. Benson. The work of each of these admirably represents the qualities above referred to, and in certain instances may seem to indicate a deeper appreciation of character. It is because of a still more marked intention in this direction that I mention separately the work of John W. Alexander. Nevertheless, he is perhaps more characteristically represented by what I have chosen to call the portrait of esprit, in his case distinguished by a very decorative composition and a flat manner of

J. J. SHANNON

not be confused with the simple sincerity, both of this early example, has

Art Institute, Pittsburgh

CECILIA BEAUX

...ple dignity of its pose, for the ...ss of its brushwork, and for its ...head and hands and carriage of the ... best.

...n of the Johns Hopkins Hospital

REALISM

painting that enhances the decorative suggestion. He has been happily represented also by many purely figure subjects.

Foremost among the portraitists of character stands Wilton Lockwood, the example of whose work illustrated here exhibits the soundness, subtlety and imaginative insight of his present matured style. Another painter whose portraits, too rarely seen, possess the qualities of depth and force, is Joseph de Camp. They both work in Boston, as also does Frederic P. Vinton, whose portraits of men, while less dexterous in technique, are powerful records of the strong breed that is shaping the life of affairs in modern America.

Indeed, it is worth notice that where psychological insight appears in an American portrait, the subject will usually be a man. The same is true to-day in France, just as it was in England at the close of the eighteenth century. That the decline of the English Portrait School was due in a large measure to the excessive popularity of the portraits of women of fashion, with all its temptation to the artist of pre-occupying himself with furbelows and finery in lieu of stronger and deeper qualities, can scarcely be doubted; and equally in modern America the same cause is at work, retarding the lustier growth of our art.

Parallel with this tendency to lack of character in portraiture runs a poverty of imagination in figure-painting generally. With a few exceptions, it is very apparent in American painting, and for a while was equally characteristic of French art. It has been a perhaps not unnatural result of the attention paid to technique. The new methods were so fascinating that painters became too much enamoured of the skill with which they could render the appearances of things. Many lost sight of the fact that technique is but the means to expression, and extolled it as an end in itself. Hence was started in Paris, and thence imported to America, the confession of faith in "art for art's sake."

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

It had, as other such rallying cries, a modicum of sanity and much extravagance. It was in its best sense a protest against the dependence of painting upon literature, and against the tendency to consider the subject of more importance than the method of representation. It was an assertion never out of place, that the quality of the artistic form must be the final test of a work of art. But it ran to extravagance in assuming that the artistic form was the only test; that what it might embody was of no account at all; that the method of presentation was the first, last, and only important concern of the artist. It put asunder the twain that should be one flesh—the form and the expression. The result was for a time, sterility; much

JOHN W. ALEXANDER

has exhibited to a marked degree particular technique suggests.

WILTON LOCKWOOD

Lockwood's early training was under an environment in which his temperament was confirmed in its preference for the spiritual rather than the physical ego. His work was done in atmosphere and elaborated into a form of expression of the figure is sufficiently real, excellent. His portrait of John La Farge is another cry and little wool; plenty of good workmanship, but a poverty of emotional or spiritual significance.

REALISM

Meanwhile, landscape painting, for the most part unaffected by this tendency, kept steadily on its path of progress. We resume its story in the next chapter.

CHAPTER XII

FURTHER STUDY OF LIGHT AND PROGRESS OF LANDSCAPE

WE have already seen how American painting has been affected by the influence of Velasquez. By an age that had become enamoured of realism he was discovered to have been the most distinguished of realists; not only in his way of seeing his subject, but of representing it. Modern painters imitated his impressionistic way of comprehending and summarising the subject, and his method of painting the "values," or varying quantities and qualities of light given off from every part of the figure and scene. In one respect, however, they carried the realism of painting a step further than Velasquez. He had painted for the most part in the grey light of Philip the Fourth's palace; they, however, extended their studies of light into the open air and experimented in the representation of all kinds and degrees of light. This has been the special contribution of modern times to the art of painting.

It represents the final emancipation of the painter not only from the restrictions of Academic draughtsmanship, but also from subservience to particularly distinguished by the richness of the brushwork.

ROBERT HENRI

 He is able in his work. He is able upon making sound their art. An able mind and imagination

FRANK W. BENSON

who has made a close study of American

PROGRESS OF LANDSCAPE

the Old Masters in the picture galleries. He would be free of all conventions and see the world for himself; no longer through the medium of varnish and the dirt and discoloration of time that disfigured the old pictures, but in all the freshness of its real colouring. It was, on the one hand, a logical extension of the nature-study of the Barbizon men; and, on the other, the painter's conformity with the realistic and scientific tendency of the time.

Manet's study of sunlight started the vogue of plein air. Men began to paint in the open air. Among the earliest and best of the pictures produced under this condition were those of Alexander Harrison, a native of Philadelphia. In Arcady, for example, represents a fragment of a meadow, interspersed with gnarled trunks and slender tree stems, among which, in easy natural attitudes, are grouped three nude girls. The sunlight filters through the canopy of leaves, dappling the grass and gilding here and there a leaf or blade of grass, glancing over the human forms and touching the delicate flesh tones with shafts of radiance. It was the product at once of keen observation and of sure and dainty craftsmanship, while it breathed a spirit of poetry that lifted the whole scene into an idyl. Even more decisive, however, both in its virtuosity and in its effect upon contemporary painting, was his later picture, The Wave, which is now in the galleries of the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts. For the first time the true colouring of the blue water, curling over a smooth, sandy shore, had been searched into and recorded; the light that glinted on its crest, lay on the shining curve of the swell, or nestled in the hollow of the trough—each aspect had been rendered in its true relation. And the result of this truthful rendering of the passage of light over the wave was to increase the suggestion of the latter's movement. The picture was a beautiful lesson in colour, light, and movement.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

This trinity of qualities became the faith of the moderns. It is literally a three in one: light the source, colour the product, movement the spirit or expression. Let the Academicians be satisfied to keep to a convention in which art is divorced from life. It was the aim of the new men to effect a union of the two, to make art an expression of nature and of human life, and, incidentally, of their own temperaments, or souls. The secret of this they had discovered in the study of that element wherein things live and move and have their being. It was no longer form alone that had to be considered; but form in relation to and as affected by the surrounding, that it has in nature, of lighted atmosphere. And this study gave a more definite meaning to Impressionism. It is realism extended by study of what the French call the milieu—the

THE WAVE

ALEXANDER HARRISON

THIS large canvas, measuring 40 by 100 inches, still justifies the enthusiasm that its original appearance aroused. For it was among the earliest of the plain air pictures, in which the actual appearance of sunlight upon masonry scates was recorded, and with such extraordinary subtlety of rendering that the truth of it has never been surpassed.

In the Collection of the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, Philadelphia way of representing children and of his

F. W. BENSON

 phl. It is painted with a facile and direct the spontaneity of the impression.

PROGRESS OF LANDSCAPE

surrounding conditions, through which the subject is viewed. And this is the principle that distinguishes the newer realism from such realistic pictures as those, for example, of the Düsseldorfians. The latter represented scenes of peasant life, in which the characters are playing more or less natural parts; but the realism is confined to the forms, and does not embrace a representation of the actual conditions of light and atmosphere in which they would appear in nature. They painted realistic pictures, but they did not represent the real manifestations of life.

The latter, in all their infinite degrees from seriousness to triviality, became the study of the moderns. The result has been a general extension of skilful craftsmanship, of a painter-like way of seeing and rendering the subject, which has not always been put to any very interesting purpose. A vast majority of modern pictures, including many American ones, are nothing more than studies of light as it filters through muslin curtains, creeps between the slats of Venetian blinds, or in full sunshine pours over the lace caps of peasant women or the white gowns of first communicants. These devices, multiplied a thousandfold, have engrossed the attention of the painter. He has been applauded by his brother painters, because they recognise the subtlety of his observation, and his manual dexterity, but to the laymen, who regard such ex-cellences as, after all, but a means to an end, these pictures have become more than a little wearisome. It is as if a speaker should utter an interminable string of well-turned phrases, with not one idea involved in them to stir either one's intelligence or imagination—vacant chaff.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

The best fruits of this new method of study and practice have been furnished, at any rate in America, by the landscape painters. It is to their advantage that they do not have to hunt up or invent subjects for pictures. Nature offers them an inexhaustible choice, and their own love of nature keeps their sympathies active. The fascination of technical proficiency seldom monopolises their interest; they feel constantly the stirring of emotion in themselves, and delight to express it in their pictures. The latter are rarely without some quality of idealism.

The modern landscape, as a rule, is characterised by an absence of strong contrasts. The colours of shadows have been carefully analysed, and found to contain more light and a greater variety of colour than had previously been suspected. The shadow is regarded no longer as a dark spot, but as a spot from which more or less light has been intercepted. Therefore, it varies in density according to the quality of light that pervades the scene, as well as according to the amount of light that is intercepted. The colours of shadows also of this Boston artist. It is the character of expression recorded by the eye. Further, the ensemble, everything also in its proper effects on form, color, and texture.

EDMUND C. TARBELL

J. ALDEN WEIR

ions of femininity. Though the tender of the head, it pervades the whole canvas, ess and in the sensitive repose of the of the National Gallery, Washington

PROGRESS OF LANDSCAPE

are not uniform; they depend upon the local colour of the object on which they lie; the shadow on grass, for instance, differing from that on snow. Moreover, the colour may be affected in tone by the reflections from other adjacent objects. For instance, the shadow on a girl's face, if she is seated in the sunshine upon grass, may receive from the latter a green tone. In this discrimination of the colour and tones of shadows, the quality of the prevailing light, as we have remarked, is a most essential ingredient.

It is, in fact, in analysing the different kinds and degrees of light that modern painters have made a new and important contribution to art. They have not been satisfied with general distinctions between bright and dull light, or cold and warm, but have pushed their investigations into its varying aspects, under different conditions of weather, season, locality, and, even, time of day.

In this close analysis of the varying manifestations of light, no one has surpassed the Frenchman, Monet. He carried forward the study begun by Manet; and there are few modern landscapes that do not owe something to his example, although they may not follow his method. The latter represents a manner of laying on the paint to which the French have given the name pointilliste, since it covers the canvas with innumerable little points or dabs. This method was suggested to him and his friends, Seurat and Pissarro, by the writings of the late Professor Rood of Columbia University. For they recognised that in this study of light the discoveries of scientists might aid the vision of the artist. Among the experiments described by Rood was the following:

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Two or three pigments having been selected, they were first mixed together, as a painter would mix them on his palette, and applied to a white card. Secondly, each pigment, in the same proportion as before, was painted directly on to a white disc, so that the latter was covered with the two or three segments of pure colour. When this disc was revolved rapidly, these blended into one tint, that corresponded in hue with that obtained by mixing the pigments on the palette, but was found to be more intense, for it contained more light. Monet and his friends, whose prime end was to represent light, derived a hint from this experiment. Instead of mixing their colours on the palette, they would lay them separately on the canvas, very close together, and rely upon the eye of the spectator, at the requisite distance, to effect the blending. For an actual mingling they substituted a visual impression of it.

Some eyes, however, seem to be physically unable to effect this blending; many more are offended by the spottiness of the method; moreover, a great many of Monet's canvases suggest experiment the actualities of the scene, together with

J. ALDEN WEIR

CHILDE HASSAM

...in separate points or dabs of color which, at the whole scene palpitates with light. It is this feeling that underlies his keen study of the rather than realisation, and are embarrassing even to those who admire his best work. Consequently his method has not been popular either with painters or with the public.

PROGRESS OF LANDSCAPE

The latter, however, have made the mistake, since Monet is an impressionist, of confounding this method with impressionism, with which it has absolutely nothing to do. It would be just as reasonable to conclude that every impressionist painter wears a sweater, and loose trousers turned up over strong shoes. The one is Monet's method of dressing, as the other is of painting; neither has anything to do with the principles which underly his motive as an artist. He is an impressionist because, to quote the definition given above, he has "extended realism by a study of the milieu." He is a leader among impressionists because he has been foremost in pushing the study, so as to include an extended variety of surrounding conditions, and to discriminate between them with such subtle refinement. It is chiefly due to his influence that modern landscapes are so pure and fresh in colour, and exhibit such a subtlety of observation and expression.

Among the very few Americans who have directly followed his method the most distinguished is Childe Hassam. His earlier efforts are marked by the crudity that is inseparable from experimentation; but of late years he has mastered the difficulties of the process, and his pictures now present a unity of effect, a vibrancy of colour, and a delicate esprit both of style and feeling, that render them almost unique in American art.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Courbet in the early days of realism used to affirm that the main thing for each painter to aim at was the emancipation of the individual; and in modern landscape this has certainly been achieved. The close study of the actual phenomena of nature, seen necessarily through the painter's own eyes and affected by his own peculiarity of temperament, has produced over the wide field of landscape a great variety, and in the pictures of each man an equally notable individuality. This latter fact makes it impossible to enumerate examples. Any attempt to characterise our landscape painters in batches, according to some assumed similarity of motive or method, would be arbitrary as well as inexact. To single out a few names would work injustice to many others, and be outside the purpose of our story, which has been to note the progress of our painting, in hope that the reader may find in the general statement a clue to the appreciation of particular individuals.

Nevertheless, I will conclude this summary of modern American landscape with a particular instance. It is that of the late John H. Twachtman, whose work revealed a quality of idealism that may be said to represent the most modern note in painting. Earlier in our story we touched upon the

CHILDE HASSAM

... grace of the human form and the
... ar sunshine, respectively, on the blue
... s, violets, and greens of the indented
... ensive repose.

[illegible]

PROGRESS OF LANDSCAPE

landscape painter's study of the forms of nature, as a basis for any subsequent expression of sentiment. It is not the least of the enjoyment to be derived from many pictures that they make one conscious of the strong-ribbed substance of the earth, the force and vigour of the trees and vegetation, the reach of sky, the volume and buoyancy of clouds, and the weight and movement of water. Before such pictures we experience that stir of blood and suggestion to the imagination which we may feel in the presence of nature itself, and often in a heightened form.

On the other hand, there may be pictures in which the artist has so thoroughly comprehended the facts of nature that for his own need and ours he can lay aside the consideration of them. He has extracted from them their essential abstract significance, so that he interprets that highest kind of sentiment, which is not a product of the individual and personal, but a whisper from the universal. To anyone who esteems of highest value the abstract expression in a picture, some of John H. Twachtman's landscapes are of superlative interest.

Living upon a farm near Greenwich, Connecticut, he absorbed the facts of his surroundings so completely that their very spirit entered into him, and it was the spirit that he strove to render on canvases that are marvels of delicate tonality. In examples like the Brook in Winter (for he seems to have had a partiality for winter scenes), it is the soul, as it were, of the still, cold, dormant world that he has rendered. Never has been better expressed through the subtle resources of modern methods of painting the suggestion of the abstract. For Twachtman, in technical matters, was a modern of the moderns, and ahead of all but a few of them in what he sought to express. He realised, as Whistler, for example, did, that if painting in the future is to hold its own alongside the developments of modern music, it can only be by finding its motive in the abstract.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

His best work, like Whistler's, has in it the latest modern note of idealism. It represents the effort of the artist to free himself from the encumbrance of the material, by giving expression to the spirit that abides in matter.

JOHN W. TWACHTMAN

cond felt and rend red in the artist's most the cold, motionless water, and lies which seems to hover the spent breath of On, rose, and violet. In the dry, white, acundity is checked; nature is inert; and the scene is an emanation of nature's spirit.

In the Collection of John Gellatly, Esq.

63

CHAPTER XIII

WHISTLER

THE previous chapter concluded with a reference to Whistler. He has been reserved until the close of the story, since his art in a very striking way reflected the various influences of the Impressionistic movement. To those influences which we have already discussed must be added one more—that of Japanese art.

It was in the early 'sixties that the Japanese prints and paintings began to find their way into Paris studios and attract the interest of certain artists, notably of Manet, Monet, and Whistler. To men who had already learned to appreciate Velasquez's impressionistic way of seeing his subject, his dignity of line and the subtlety of his colour harmonies, the Japanese work came as a corroboration of the lesson. Here, too, were miracles of harmony in blacks and greys, and in addition a range of tonal effects of an infinite variety and extraordinary subtlety, that opened up to the imagination of the colourist a new world of motives. They offered also a new principle of composition. The old method of building up and balancing, invented by the great Italians and preserved by the Academicians, did not suit the purpose of the Impressionists who were bent on achieving a union of art and life. In real life people do not dispose themselves in formal groups, and affect set poses; the suggestion is rather of spontaneity, unexpectedness, and movement. How to reconcile these with unity of effect, and grace and dignity of composition? The answer was discovered in the art of the Japanese.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

It appeared that they, too, were Impressionists; not interested in form for its own sake, but in the suggestion that it afforded to the artist's imagination, and that they had developed a principle of composition suitable to their needs. The aim of the artist was to make his painting or drawing decorative, but instead of arranging his lines and masses in a geometric pattern, suggested by the formality of architecture, he had gone to nature for inspiration. In nature it is not order but irregularity that prevails, and yet this disorder presents appearances of unity of effect. The masses of hills against the sky, the contours of coastline as it pushes its way sharply into the sea, or recedes in swelling curves, the windings of rivers and streams, the free growth of vines, and the spotting of trees against the hillside, of labourers working in the rice-fields, or fishing boats dotting the distant waters—these and countless other phenomena had gradually taught the Japanese to find a new kind of symmetry. It was the result of careful calculation, and gratified the eye with a sense of unity; yet it had the appearance of being the result of accident. It was characterised by spontaneity, unexpectedness, and movement.

WHISTLER

The fitness of this to the purpose of investing the appearance of reality with artistic charm was immediately apparent to artists like Manet, Degas, Monet, and Whistler. From their hands it passed to others, until now you cannot open an illustrated magazine without finding the evidence of it.

But, while countless men have adopted this technical principle, some few have discovered the psychological motive underlying it. In the best periods of Japanese art, religion and art were inseparable. The philosophy of religion taught the supremacy of spirit over matter; and the joy and the duty of the artist was to interpret this truth. So by him perishable matter was regarded as only the outward and visible sign of the indwelling, eternal, universal spirit. Form for its own sake did not occupy his attention; as far as possible, he eliminated from it all its grossness, all its suggestion of matter, striving to extract its essence and to interpret it in terms of spirit. Like the old Byzantine art, Japanese art was symbolical.

Now, the growth of realism in Europe corresponded with a loosening of religious beliefs.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

The old foundations of spirituality were being swept away by materialism. In art, both the Academic and the Realistic schools were materialistic; each in its own way magnified the importance of form, and matter, as such, was the object of its worship. But here and there appeared an artist to whom the representation of the material was of less moment than the expression of the spiritual and universal, and such found in the symbolism of Japanese art an inspiration and a clue. One of these was James MacNeill Whistler.

He was born at Lowell, Massachusetts, in 1834. His father, Major George Whistler, an eminent engineer, having accepted a commission in Russia to lay out the St. Petersburg and Moscow Railroad, continued to occupy an influential position under Emperor Nicholas. After the father's death the mother returned to America to educate her son, who in time was entered at West Point. His stay there, however, was short, and his next move was to Paris, where he became the pupil of Gleyre, in whose studio he associated with Degas, Bracquemond, Fantin-Latour, and Legros. Yet this period of Academic instruction was but an incident in his career.

His art was a product of most delicate selection: a hybrid derived from the intermingling of many strains—Velasquez, Rossetti, the Impressionists, and Japanese—with his own rarely gifted personality, itself a curious mingling of aristocratic hauteur and spiritual sensibility.

WHISTLER

From Velasquez he learned the value of the grand line, and of the variously defined and vanishing outlines; the placing of the figure in cool, real atmosphere, and the dignity and refinement of tones of black and grey; from Rossetti, the fascination of his woman with "the star-like sorrows of immortal eyes"; from the Impressionists, the renunciation of form, as such by means of lines, and the rendering of its effect by chromatic values of colour, harmonised in the medium of natural light, instead of the golden atmospheres created by the older masters. And by the Japanese he was inspired to more ravishing harmonies of tone, harmonies of sumptuous sobriety, of tender or sparkling sprightliness, and was taught the secret of their composition, the fanastic balancing of irregular forms and spaces, with continual surprise of detail, and the arbitrary choice of a point of view, such as looking at the scene from below or from a point higher up than the spot from which one would normally expect to view it. Lastly, the Japanese helped him to find in form a symbol of the spiritual.

These various strands of motive he wove into the warp of his own creation, and the result was a fabric which had the faded splendour of old Gobelin tapestry.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

But, after all, it is the character of the warp, the personal expression of himself, that is the element of salient interest in his art. He was par excellence a "painter"; one, that is to say, who did not view nature as a collection of forms to be delineated by lines and filled in afterwards with colour, but as an accord of coloured masses. By means of these coloured masses he rendered the effect of form. He mocked at the uncompromising reproduction of the model, as he did at the idea that nature is always beautiful.

"Nature indeed," he wrote, "contains the elements in colour and form of all pictures, as the keyboard contains the notes of all music. But the artist is born to pick and choose and group with science these elements, that the result may be beautiful—as the musician gathers his notes and forms chords, until he brings forth from chaos glorious harmonies." Again he wrote: "And when the evening mist clothes the riverside with poetry, as with a veil, and the poor buildings lose themselves in the dim sky, and the tall chimneys become campanili, and the warehouses are palaces in the night, and the whole city hangs in the heavens, and fairy-land is before us—then the wayfarer hastens home; the workingman and the cultured one, the wise man and the one of pleasure, cease to understand, as they have ceased to see; and Nature, who for once has sung in tune, sings her exquisite song to the artist alone, her son and her master—her son in that he loves her, her master in that he knows her. To him her secrets are unfolded; to him her lessons have become gradually clear. He looks at her flower, not with the enlarging lens, that he may gather facts for the botanist, but with the light of the one who sees in her choice selection of brilliant tones and delicate tints, suggestion of future harmonies.”

WHISTLER

In this last sentence he betrays the ultima ratio of his artistic purpose, which was to extract from Nature her abstract appeal to the sense of sight, even as the chemist distils from flowers the fragrance that will appeal to the sense of smell, or as a musician from the throbbing of his brain brings forth the abstract harmonies of sound. In the pride of his art he claimed for it an independent value that needed no bolstering up with words. He would, if possible, have made it entirely independent of ideas. For a while he tried the experiment of leaving out forms and relying solely on tones of colour, calling his canvases “nocturnes,” “symphonies,” or “harmonies,” because he was trying by means of colour to emulate the musician’s use of sounds. Of course the public did not understand these efforts, and expended much thin witticism over the experiment. For it was merely an experiment; re-establishing the truth, very generally disregarded in those days, that colour, when used harmonically, makes an independent, abstract impression on the imagination; but otherwise unavailing, for the painter cannot get away permanently from what is at once the strength and the disability of his art—the necessity of representing the appearances of objects. This Whistler realised.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

He did not ignore form—very far from it; but it was the effect of form, in its relation to the character of the subject and in its relation to considerations of abstract beauty, that alone seemed to him to be worth interpretation. In a material age he made his artistic protest against the accepted axiom that “seeing is believing”; teaching and proving in his works that it is not what the average man sees that counts for much in art, but what, for the most part, he omits to see, since he sees only with the ocular vision and is prone to peer through spectacles.

So, in that masterpiece, The Portrait of the Artist's Mother, he did not picture a lady as she would appear to the indifferent gaze of strangers, but as she was known to the heart of her son in the spiritual communion of their mutual love. And the son being a great master, the picture becomes the noblest tribute to motherhood that painting can show, and to everyone who has known the blessing of a good mother the most wonderful interpretation of his own devotion, if he have eyes to see it.

JAMES A. McNEILL WHISTLER

...at in Black and Gray"; for the compo...cord of colored masses." The black and ...cap and handkerchief, and the dull green
 ...gravity with tenderness, reticence with
 ...the Collection of the Luxembourg, Paris

JAMES A. McNEILL WHISTLER

ularities in the pose of the figure are nature of the great preacher-historian, with its mane of gray locks shows wearily expressionism, lifted to the high plane of

Corporation Art Galleries, Glasgow

WHISTLER

In The Portrait of Carlyle the figure is entirely in black, the pallid face and grey hair silhouetted against a grey wall, the whole enveloped in a dull, dreary atmosphere. It is, indeed, a colour arrangement of slightly different tones of black and grey, forming a sombre harmony that Richard Muther, the German critic-historian, has likened to a funeral march. The prevailing expression is one of weariness of soul and mind. The volcanic fire that used to glow white-hot in this bitter opponent of all world-shams has burned itself to blackness and grey ash. Whether or not this truly represented, at the time the portrait was painted, the personality of Carlyle, work-worn though he was and a chronic sufferer from dyspepsia, may be doubted. The making of a likeness was seldom in Whistler's thoughts; it was the impression that the subject made upon his imagination that he strove to render; and in this case it is a pathetic one, consistent with itself, and most poetically wrought. It reveals, moreover, that aloofness so characteristic of this master's work. The figure dwells apart in an atmosphere of its own, far from the glare and din of the world, wrapt in the calm that follows after passion. In the Sarasate, however, another study in black and greys only relieved by the whiteness of the shirt, the figure is represented as emerging from darkness, but only into a half light. The magic of his genius is still suspended, only a suggestion of it being hinted at in the nervous delicacy of the hands.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

The value of elusiveness in a work of art was one of the great truths that Whistler's example teaches. It is this quality which gives it pungency of suggestion and enduring interest; just as a woman, to hold the heart of a man, must preserve some savour of inaccessible mystery. Of what is obviously and fully realised, if it yield no further suggestion, human nature soon tires.

The Nocturne-Bognor is penetrated with this quality of elusiveness; phantom shapes glimmering in misty, ethereal light, a spirit picture, rendering the impressions which such a scene in nature gently makes upon the imagination. So gently, that, while we are filled with sensations, they are vague, unrealisable; our spirit is allured to infinite longings in the very unattainableness of which there is a poignancy of cleansing sadness. If you have come under the spell of this enchantment in the actual presence of Nature, you recognise it instantly in this picture; if you have not, the picture may lead you to find it.

What the artist has given us is not the facts of nature, but their effect upon the spirit; interpreting the dream or spirit world, of which the actual is the solid basis. "The landscapes of Whistler are places of dreamland," says Muther; "landscapes of the mind, summoned with closed eyes and

JAMES A. MCNEILL WHISTLER

AT THE PIANO

ONE of the artist's earliest examples, painted probably in 1860. An arrangement in black, gray, and white. In its directness of composition and yet subtlety of feeling and expression a prelude to those great portraits of his mother and Carlyle.

A. McNEILL WHISTLER

of Velasquez and of the

WHISTLER

set free from everything coarse and material, breathed upon the picture and encompassed with mysteries." It was not the forms of nature per se which interested him, but their significance to the spirit; the suggestion of beauty which they yielded to the imagination. To quote Müther again: "Like the Japanese, but with brilliant refinements such as never occurred even to the greatest painters, this wonderful harmonist has the art of simplifying and of spiritualising, retaining the mere essence of forms, and of colours; only what is transient, subtle, musical."

If you set that wonderful portrait, The White Girl, or, as Whistler called it to distinguish it from another corresponding motive, Symphony in White, No. 1, before a young girl the fragrance of whose nature is still fresh, who still has the sanctity of maidenhood in her soul, undesecrated by precocious contact with the world, it will be strange if she does not find in the picture an echo of her own heart and thinkings. Nor can anyone to whom the exquisitely delicate flower of maidenhood is precious fail to discover therein an interpretation of his own feelings.

Again, in The Little Lady Sophie of Soho, what tenderness of spiritual insight! This child of untoward chances, dwelling in an unsavoury district of a great city, carrying her girlhood in and out of studios! The great master has dipped beneath externals; has looked beyond what she was to what she might have been, to what indeed she may, in a measure, still have been, and spied a flicker of pure flame within her tarnished soul. There is a pitiful tenderness in the rendering of the girl's face, as it peers at us from its frame of elf-locks, out of the mystery of the dim, dark background. It is treated also with a touch of irony, with that mingling of pity and mockery with which the gods, themselves not free from Fate, are fabled to have watched the lives of fate-distraught mortals; and withal it is full of mystery, pregnant with the cry of why such things must be and the wonder as to whither they tend.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Nor in Whistler's paintings, despite the mystery and spirituality, and notwithstanding the elusiveness of the brushwork, is there any lack of virility. Dignity of line and mass and tone proclaims the master; and the actual laying-on of the pigment something greater than the skilful audacity of a magician of the brush. We do not see the stroke of hand which dazzles and bewilders. It is rather as if the presence on the canvas had been invoked by a supreme effort of will, so that, by the side of one of his portraits, the work of the brilliant brush-technist is apt to seem commonplace. Perhaps one reason is that such legerdemain is for the most part associated with a keen fondness for the actual, the artist being enamoured of externals, the coquetries of costume, the intrinsic desirableness of fine fabrics. So that it may be due to inferiority of motive, rather than to the difference of technique, that he seems to suffer by comparison.

WHISTLER

Not that Whistler ignored the fascination of textures and fabrics. No artist could. But it was not their mere appearance of valuableness per yard with which he concerned himself, but their sentiment of æsthetic suggestion. I recall, for example, the curtains in The Music Room, creamy white, with sprigs of flowers. What a sense of freshness and purity they give to the room! And the costume in which he represents some grande dame will offer little comfort to a milliner, nor much to the lady, if it were her gown on which she depended to be attractive. Whistler, indeed, made the dignity of the woman superior to and independent of the costume.

Besides enforcing the need of selection in art and that the spiritual and æsthetic significance of things is more worthy of the artist's study than the mere appearances, Whistler waged war against the preference of the Philistine for what he calls a "finished picture." He had a fine scorn for the tailor-kind of mind which yearns to see each button, tag, and furbelow reproduced precisely, as well as for that furnishing and upholstering propensity which desires a picture to be as crowded with details as the average parlour, and every detail highly polished. With him a picture was finished when he had succeeded, as far as might be, in reproducing the impression that he had in mind, and in disguising the means by which he had created it.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

It was in his etchings that he reached the maximum of expression by the smallest expenditure of means; for the medium admits a greater possibility of omission and suggestion. In the hands of a master, that is to say, for the ordinary etcher will load his plate with lines. But the mental superiority of Whistler, as an artist, was in no way more demonstrated than in his power of forming a conception of the scene and then in a few flexible, pregnant lines, executed with apparent ease, giving its character and expressiveness.

It has been remarked that he created no school. It was neither possible nor necessary. The finest quality of his art was personal to himself, an emanation of genius, not transferable; the principles that he adopted were diversely used by others; his tenets too simple and universal to found or need a school for their propagation. He did better than attract a few followers and imitators; he influenced the whole world of art. Consciously or unconsciously, his presence is felt in countless studios; his genius permeates modern artistic thought.

It may be equally an inspiration to ourselves. We are overmuch drilled from childhood to catch at the form and miss the substance; to substitute words and phraseologies for thinking and ideas; to estimate life by material standards and to sharpen our wits at the expense of what is spiritual; to have little reverence or habit of quiet thoughtfulness, and too soon to lose the fragrance of our natures in the withering heat of worldliness. With Whistler, we may do well to enter at times into the tranquil half-light of the soul, and ponder upon the things of the Spirit.

WHISTLER

CHAPTER XIV

SOME NOTES ON MURAL PAINTING

IN 1817 Congress gave Trumbull a commission for four paintings to adorn the Capitol. The intention of Congress in appropriating $32,000 for this work was to commemorate certain important events in the history of the new Republic, and the artist conceived and treated his subjects in the manner of historical pictures. It was fidelity to the incident rather than any ideas of making his paintings decorative, that influenced him. Though intended for wall spaces, they were not in the true sense mural paintings. Why they were not, may perhaps be understood by a comparison of the first commission in this country, given and accepted as advisedly a work of mural decoration. The date was 1876; the building, Trinity Church, Boston, and the immediate principals in the transaction were H. H. Richardson, the architect, and the painter, John La Farge.

Two points are of importance: first, that it was the architect then, engaged in building the church, who realised that its interior effect would be improved by a scheme of painted decoration; secondly, that although the scheme might involve the representation of certain persons or incidents of the Bible, its primary and final purpose was to be complementary to the architecture. To these points another may be added, not perhaps essential, but certainly conducive to a successful result, that the whole scheme of interior colouring, its smallest details as well as the important figure compositions, was entrusted to one man.

NOTES ON MURAL PAINTING

Here we get an inkling of what mural painting really is. It is not the affixing of a picture to the walls, as we hang a picture on the wall of a living-room to embellish it, or for the separate interest and value of the picture. It becomes an integral part of an architectural unit. Trinity Church, for example, is in design an adaptation of the Romanesque style which in addition to vaulted roofs has an excess of wall over window space. These surfaces in the mediæval churches were frequently overlaid with marble veneer and mosaic. Richardson determined to substitute a painted decoration, that should at once relieve the barrenness of the interior and unite all its parts into an ensemble of rich harmoniousness. It is indeed as a whole that the interior affects us. Within, as outside, the culmination of the design is the centre tower, crowned with a low spire. To it converge the short nave and side aisles, the transepts and apse-ended chancel. The plan, in fact, is more apparent inside than without, and while the stained-glass windows make intervals of brilliant splendour, the general effect is one of subdued dignity of tone, out of the mystery of which, if you are minded to look for them, the details of the decoration may be discerned. But as I have said, the first and chief impression is of an organic unity of colour growing out of the architecture, the very dimness of the effect seeming characteristic of this particular architectural style, which in its origin belonged to the South and was designed to exclude rather than to admit the light.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Moreover, the Romanesque style of Southern France, which was the particular brand of the Romanesque that Richardson had adopted, had been itself an adaptation by comparatively unskilled Western builders of various influences, only partly digested—the Byzantine, the Roman, and the Greek. There was a peculiar fitness, that probably presented itself to Richardson's mind and was certainly present in La Farge's, in choosing this character of construction for the first attempt in the New Western World to combine the labours of the architect and decorator in some scheme that might emulate the traditions of the past. In La Farge's own words: "It would permit, as long ago it has permitted, a wide range of skill in artistic training; the rough bungling of the native and the ill-digested culture of the foreigner. I could think myself back to a time when I might have employed some cheap Byzantine of set habits, some ill-equipped Barbarian, some Roman, dwelling near by for a time—perhaps even some artist, keeping alive both the tradition and culture of Greece.” And it was under similar conditions of limited experience on the part of the artist, of habits confirmed in a wrong direction on the part of available workmen, of low trade ideals and indifferent materials, that the beginnings of a new movement in America were inaugurated. For, although La Farge had been giving some attention to decorative problems, especially to those of colour, his opportunities of practical experience had been small indeed as compared with the magnitude of this one. He was at a moment’s notice launched into what was, under the circumstances, a huge experiment; the subordinates on whom he had to rely were inexperienced, and, as a climax to these limitations, he was compelled to work amid the discomfort and confusion of a windowless, unfinished building, under the severe strain of having to conceive, elaborate, and conclude this big scheme in a short space of time.

NOTES ON MURAL PAINTING

This tendency to “rush” the artist, which is not infrequently characteristic of decorative commissions in our country, was illustrated again two years later in the case of W. M. Hunt. He was requested to paint two decorations of considerable size for the Capitol at Albany, the time allotted him for their inception and completion being thirteen weeks! He produced the Flight of Night and The Discoverer, but at what cost! The mental and physical strain proved too much for him; the work completed, he noticeably declined, and died the following year. The work, too, has perished, for the plaster had not been allowed to dry out; it was still "green," and the paintings have since decayed and crumbled away.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

La Farge, having completed the work in Trinity Church, was almost immediately commissioned to decorate the apse of St. Thomas' in New York. Here he worked in collaboration not only with the architect, but with the sculptor, thus for the first time in this country asserting practically the interdependence and kinship of these three arts of construction and decoration. The reredos was modelled by Saint Gaudens, and on each side of it the painter installed a scene from the Resurrection, enshrining all three in a scheme of colour and of moulded and carved work, designed and partly executed by himself, though the design in its entirety was never completed. Nevertheless, as it stood, it was the most completely noble of La Farge's schemes of decoration, and its destruction in 1904 by fire was a national calamity. For there is lost to us, not only a great artistic achievement, but one that in the course of years would have had increasing historic interest as a landmark in the progress

JOHN LA FARGE

ansion, New York decoration in the country. The omposition is founded, with con-

[illegible]

THE

A vertical strip of a complex, abstract, black and white pattern. The pattern is dense and intricate, featuring a variety of geometric shapes, lines, and organic forms. It appears to be a section of a larger, repeating design, possibly a book cover or endpaper. The overall effect is one of high contrast and detailed texture.

NOTES ON MURAL PAINTING

of American art. It might also eventually have had an influence in checking what I venture to call the "department store tendencies" that characterise so largely the present manifestations of our decorative movement.

For, as we pursue the study of the latter, we shall find that instead of the mind of a master-decorator, such as La Farge is by instinct and training, being not only permitted but encouraged to control the whole scheme of internal embellishment, circumstances bring it about that the architects, whose talent and metier are primarily of the constructive order, have become also the decorative designers of the interiors, deputing the execution of their schemes to a variety of subordinates. It is a highly organised system, capable of turning out an immense quantity of work, creditable in quality, but of little personal distinction. Yet, if we study the matter, we shall find that the system has grown inevitably out of existing conditions.

Little more than a quarter of a century ago the ground in our development now occupied by architecture and decoration was a prairie wilderness, spotted here and there with beautiful survivals of a past taste, such as the examples of Colonial mansions and churches, and of later public edifices, like the White House and the Capitol. For the rest it was a waste upon which modern disfigurements had encroached. Then two men appeared as pioneers: H. H. Richardson,* already mentioned, and Richard Morris Hunt; both architects who, like some of our painters, had studied in Paris at the famous École des Beaux Arts.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

* * * * *

The movement they inaugurated was, from its inception, one of architecture, Hunt representing the constructive, logical phase of the art, Richardson its more notably æsthetic possibilities. The latter, as we have seen, hastened to secure the co-operation of La Farge. But decorators such as he are not to be found by the wayside. There was no other painter in the country to whom an architect could safely have entrusted an important scheme of decoration in its entirety. Moreover, La Farge has always been too much of an investigator and experimenter to adapt himself to the "driving hurry" of American methods, and, furthermore, he very soon turned aside into a special department of decoration, that of decorated windows. How in this direction he proved himself to be an original genius, substituting for the usual stained glass the use of opalescent glass, thereby inventing a new kind of window, distinguished by extreme richness and subtlety of colour, has already occupied our notice in a previous chapter. It interfered with his continuing the rôle in which he had already qualified, as à painter who could undertake and carry through an ensemble of mural decoration. There was still another reason. When he was in the prime of his vigour, the period of opportunity in the shape of great public buildings had scarcely begun, and, by the time that it was fairly afoot, the architects were from the circumstances of the case, not only the initiators, but the controllers of the movement.

* Is it not rather characteristic of American attitude toward artistic genius that the "Universal Cyclopædia," published in New York, 1901, a newly revised and enlarged edition, omits the name of this architect?

NOTES ON MURAL PAINTING

The event from which this movement has gone on advancing with steadily increasing bulk and momentum was the World's Fair at Chicago. Previously to this there had been divers instances of mural decoration in the private houses of the rich, and at least one public building, the new Hotel Ponce de Leon at St. Augustine, had been elaborately decorated, while the Trustees of the Boston Public Library had already given commissions for mural paintings to the French artist, Puvis de Chavannes, and to Sargent and Abbey. But the effect of this and other sporadic efforts was multiplied ad infinitum by the consolidated grandeur of the "White City." It was an object lesson, the virtue of which, though it has been frequently described, may well be continually enforced.

It taught, in the first place, the desirableness, even the commercial value, of beauty. The shrewd, large-minded citizens of a city that is essentially the product and assertion of commerce discovered that they could give expression to their own local pride and attract business from outside, not only by following the old crude idea of attempting "the biggest show on earth," but by trying to make it the most beautiful. They succeeded; for, while millions of tired bodies testified to the former motive, as many hearts were gladdened and as many imaginations stimulated by the presentation of the latter.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

In the second place, it exhibited the mutual interdependence of the arts of construction and design; the value of combination. Buildings which might have been constructed solely with a view to separate utility were treated also as monuments of architectural design, enriched by sculpture and painting, borrowing extra dignity from one another, and placed in a worthy setting by the co-operation of the landscape designer. In a word, the natural beauties of the spot had been utilised and increased; formal features, such as terraces, fountains, and bridges, had been added, and the culminating motive had been the creation of a series of magnificent or alluring ensembles. The result was a triumph, alike for the architects and landscape designers, for the various painters and sculptors who co-operated in the details of the plan, and for the citizens of Chicago who permitted its inception and provided for its completion.

NOTES ON MURAL PAINTING

Scarcely more than a decade has elapsed since the passing of that temporarily realised dream of artistic beauty, yet already in thousands of instances throughout the country its influence has borne fruit. It is true that its biggest lesson has scarcely yet been recognised. Municipalities either are not yet aroused to the value of a combination of efforts into an ensemble, or have not had the courage or opportunity to realise it. There have been certain notable exceptions, as in the laying out of the water fronts in Chicago, Philadelphia, and New York, and in attention given to the regulation of the sky-line of buildings, as in Boston. Yet, notwithstanding these indications of a civic sense of pride and responsibility, little or nothing has been done toward an organic alleviation of the dire monotony of our gridiron street-plans, or toward a systematic treatment of such open spaces as they niggardly present. In failing to realise the value of ensembles, whether regarded as conveniences or embellishments, we are still far behind the modern activities of the Old World cities. On the other hand, in respect of the separate building, asserting itself as an independent unit, the activities in this country during the past ten years have been phenomenal.

It would be very interesting, if space permitted, to sketch the story of what our architects have accomplished; how in Federal and State buildings, in City Halls and libraries, in churches, hotels, office and trade buildings, and in city and country residences, the motives of utility and beauty, have jointly inspired the design; how the skill of the architects, trained in the knowledge of the Old World, has displayed itself both in adapting the various styles and principles to the American requirement, and in inventing new methods of construction to comply with the special conditions that exist here. If adequately told, the story would have the interest and surprise of a romance. But for our present purpose we can only note that the trend of the movement has been toward a superior logic and dignity in the character of the whole building, and toward a more sumptuous and, at the same time, more tactful use of embellishments in the details; and that in these latter the architects have more and more enlisted the co-operation of the painters.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

During the past ten years the practice of mural painting in America has spread rapidly. At first it found the majority of the painters unprepared for the particular requirements of this kind of painting. They had been trained in the principles of the easel-picture, within the frame of which the painter may adopt any method of treatment that he chooses, intent solely upon making his picture; and one, not necessarily decorative. But mural

BURNING OF THE PEGGY STEWART AT ANNAPOLIS IN 1774

A Mural Decoration in the Federal Court House, Baltimore

C. Y. TURNER

This is one of the best examples in the country of an historical incident adapted to the purpose of a mural decoration.

JOHN W. ALEXANDER
Carnegie Institute of decoration. The spirit of the City in mediæval armor, but the figure triumph, and the others, flying in from types of modern girlhood.

NOTES ON MURAL PAINTING

painting does not fulfil the purposes of its existence unless it be decorative and at the same time subsidiary to the general scheme of its surroundings, in which it should occupy the position not of a separate unit but of an integral factor. The character of its subject will partake of that of the building: solemn, serious, elegant, or sportive, according to the spirit in which the architecture, following the purpose of the building, has been planned. The character of its composition will be determined by the shape and position of the space that it is intended to adorn; the choice of its colour regulated to the prevailing colour scheme of the interior. In a word, the mural painting, besides being decorative, should be functional.

The meaning of this may be readily grasped if one remembers that the various parts of the architectural structure are not used arbitrarily, but that each has its separate function to perform in the complex arrangement of supports and resistances that make up the whole system. For example, in the Rotunda of the Library of Congress the eight ribs of the dome sweep upward until they terminate in the broad, smooth surface of the "collar," whose function is to clamp them all together and at the same time to form a support for the superincumbent cupola. Recognising this, the decorator of the "collar," Edwin H. Blashfield, devised a composition which should form a compact and continuous circle of decoration and simultaneously, by the introduction of eight principal figures, recall the eight ribs which the circle terminates. On the other hand, in the Delivery Room of the Boston Public Library, Edwin A. Abbey, commissioned to decorate the frieze and choosing for the subject the Quest of the Holy Grail, has ignored the function of a frieze, which is to counteract the various interruptions down below, of windows, doors, and fireplaces, by an effect above of continuity. Whereas he might have treated the space as a continuous whole, by dividing it into a series of panels that should succeed one another in a rhythmic sequence, he has chopped it up into a variety of different measurements.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

The more strictly functional treatment of a frieze may be studied in the same building, in the fine example of John S. Sargent's Prophets. In them there is a collective effect of continuity, a rhythmic sequence of handsome masses and striking lines. Moreover, the choice of the subject is readily comprehensible, which is a considerable virtue, since it offers no interference with one's immediate appreciation of the painting as a decoration. The panels above them, however, in the lunette and soffit of the arch, are not so simple. The pattern of their composition presents an exuberance of interwoven forms. It may be quite appropriate to the idea of turmoil involved in the subject of Polythe-

Copyright, 1934, by E. A. Blashfield

EDWIN H. BLASHFIELD

THE TRIUMPH OF MINNESOTA

A Mural Decoration in the Capitol of Minnesota

A llegory of Minnesota, represented as the "Granary of the World." While the war typifies the earlier conditions of the State, the later development of her resources is suggested by the modern reaper; nor is her share in the battles of the Union overlooked. The painting illustrates the fragrant beauty which the artist gives to his ideals of American womanhood and childhood, and also the admirable skill with which he combines allegorical figures with types of persons drawn from actual life. Here as elsewhere his work represents the academic and scholarly point of view, adjusted to the realities of our modern conditions.

Rey Print, Copyright, 1903, by Curtis and Garrison

JOHN S. SARGENT

on Public Library

anholism, in its feeling and method of painting ortion in its flat tones and conventionalized tral composition imitates, though in much ssance, while the lower figures, holding the e. The inscription, copied from a medieval ay upon words: "Made man, though myself redeem in my body their bodies and soul

NOTES ON MURAL PAINTING

ism and Apostasy from the Faith in the One God that they are intended to represent, but it is confusing to the eye. Moreover, the forms are associated with a great deal of abstruse symbolism, unintelligible to most people, so that all but a few visitors miss the decorative intention of the paintings and devote the greater portion of their study to the printed key.

Sargent himself would seem to have realised that he has here overdone the literary allusiveness of his subject, for in his latest work, The Dogma of Redemption, the symbolism is comparatively simple, and he has reverted also to simplicity of forms, partly basing his composition upon the examples of the Byzantine decorators, in many respects the finest in the Old World.

For their forms were very simple, and simply handled; not modelled into relief, but kept as a pattern of masses, of coloured masses harmonised into a rich tone, so that the whole painting was very flat. It clung to the wall, proclaimed the fact of the wall beneath, and was in a very strict sense mural.

A consciousness of the value of such principles of painting for the purpose of mural decoration is one of the distinguished characteristics of the panels by Puvis de Chavannes in the Boston Library. In the Library of Congress it has also prompted the method of Kenyon Cox. But the latter, while an excellent draughtsman, is no colourist. His panels of the Arts and Sciences, with their pale tinting not drawn into harmonic relation, give the impression of a good design not yet completed.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

The design itself is a formal arrangement of female figures, each bearing an emblem of the particular art or science which it is intended to symbolise. Were the colour as effective as the drawing, the result would be exceedingly decorative; though, in other respects, as impoverished as the present tinting. For the conception displays no imagination and offers little interest to the visitor. In this threadbare affectation of classicalism there is evidence neither of American inspiration nor of the painter himself having any participation in the fulness of our modern life. His aim has been solely decorative.

No doubt the painter himself would admit it, and very likely would defend the position that the whole end of decoration is to be decorative. That, however, was not the characteristic of the great days of Mural Decoration. Many of the finest examples were more or less frankly illustrations, as well as decorations, intended to bring home the truths and doctrines of Christianity to the masses; while those of a more purely decorative character were of a kind not only to appeal to the taste of cultivated people, but to stimulate their imagination and their personal and local pride. In either case the decoration was significant of the habit of mind and feeling of its era. So far, however, in American Mural Painting there has been little indication even of the modern spirit, much less of the particular genius of America. It is still an exotic, imperfectly acclimatised, and not yet adapted to our soil.

NOTES ON MURAL PAINTING

Nevertheless, there have been numerous attempts to make the subject interpret our special conditions. C. Y. Turner, for example, in the Manhattan Hotel, New York, has represented the City as a queenly maiden surrounded by other maidens, typifying the arts and sciences; while in attendance are realistic figures of Indians, Colonials, and portrait-groups of scientists and other distinguished persons. A similar mingling of allegory and fact appears in Albert Herter's panels of Agriculture and Commerce in a New York bank; and in panels by Edwin H. Blashfield: at Baltimore of Washington Relinquishing Office; at the Capitol of St. Paul, commemorating the agricultural triumphs of the West, and at Pittsburg, celebrating the steel industries. This last subject has been treated anew, and again with a mingling of allegorical figures and of more or less realistic accessories, in the recent paintings, executed by John W. Alexander, for the Carnegie Institute.

On the other hand, panels illustrating actual incidents and treated with regard for historical accuracy have been painted for the Boston State House by Robert Reid and Edward Simmons, while a corresponding motive influenced the treatment of F. D. Millet's Treaty of the Traverse des Sioux, for the Capitol of St. Paul, and C. Y. Turner's Opening of the Erie Canal, for the De Witt Clinton High School, New York.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

So far, therefore, as the character of the subject is concerned, we find our painters following the example of the old Italians. Sometimes they treat an incident with the fidelity to facts of an illustration; sometimes they unite allegorical and realistic elements. Evidently, then, neither of these methods is absolutely right or absolutely wrong. The character of the subject, in fact, is only a part of the matter. Of even more importance is the manner in which the subject is represented. In the first place, whether the motive is allegorical or realistic, the treatment must be decorative: the painting must be a pattern of colour, adorning the space and harmonising with the form and spirit of the surrounding architecture. But is this all that is desirable?

Are we to be satisfied merely with an agreeable or sumptuous impression? Shall we not look to receive some stir to our imagination, some fresh insight into or encouragement of the principles we believe in, some enlargement of our mental and

THE TREATY OF THE TRAVERSE DES SIOUX

FRANK D. MILLET

A Mural Decoration in the Capitol of Minnesota

A NOTHER example of the twofold motive : to record an historic incident and at the same time decorate a space.

3

NOTES ON MURAL PAINTING

spiritual horizon? It is futile to say that the times are changed; that now, since the majority of people can read, pictures have ceased to be a necessary or suitable way of reaching the imagination and conscience. It is, on the contrary, extraordinary how little essential conditions are changed. Our present age, it is true, is a reading one, of an insatiable hunger for reading; yet was there ever a time when there was so much illustration? Those whose business it is to keep a touch upon the public pulse and diagnose the symptoms of its taste, assert that it craves illustrations and must have them. Certainly it gets them, and one hears no protest.

No, the fault is not with the public, but with the painters themselves. They are, for the most part, out of touch with the vital forces at work in the community, nor possessed of that vigour and originality which characterises the leaders in other departments of life. Too few of them can strike out a truth on the anvil of facts, as Vedder has done in his decorations at Washington, particularly in the one that, with a mingling of allegory and realism, embodies the idea of Corrupt Government. The sleek respectability of the pious-faced briber, the slatternly wantonness of the women whom he prostitutes, the mute protest of the smokeless chimney-stack, the piteous appeal of the destitute, haggard child—at a glance is revealed the hideous loathsomeness of the whole dirty business. It is the work of a man who has a mind to comprehend the fact, and an imagination that can invest it with a new force of meaning, and who, moreover, is a born decorator.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

These are unusual qualities, especially in combination, and it is the lack of them that is most conspicuous in American Mural decoration. Nowhere do conditions, present and past, offer more abundant suggestions to the imagination, and nowhere are mural painters receiving so much encouragement of opportunity. Yet, with slight exceptions, they have not yet risen to the occasion. If we seek further reasons, we may find them, first of all, in the fact that most of them are not decorators. The latter are born, not made; the gift is primarily one of exuberant inventiveness. Now, American Art, in all its branches, is so far singularly barren of this quality. Its present phase involves a more or less tactful application of eclecticism. Again, the painters have been trained in a good school; but one which did not include any separate consideration of mural decoration; nor in this direction is any real provision being made even now for younger students, notwithstanding that this offers them a very large field and a rich one. Moreover, our older men have not recovered from the paralyzing effects of the "art for art's sake" formula. Taught in their youth to be afraid of an idea, their ability to conceive or express one has been stunted.

NOTES ON MURAL PAINTING

They have nothing of the dare-devil in their conception. And there is another reason. The best development in our painting has been along the lines of the small canvas, intimately treated. The excessive influence of the Barbizon pictures, the preciosity that Whistler's example fostered, and the mild domesticity of American fiction, only now just yielding place to the romantic imagining of the red-blooded writers, have helped to confine our painting within very sincere but very limited methods of expression.

As compared with this propriety, which is the distinguishing feature of American art, both literary and pictorial, the country itself presents a crudity of contrasts. A virility, not without its flavour of brutality, characterises the active life of the community, while its leisure is gilded and brocaded with a luxuriousness that recalls the splendour of Monarchical France or of Imperial Rome. But deep beneath the myriad lights and shadows of the surface is an earnestness of pride in the past and present of the race, and of confidence in the future, that in its reasonableness is without a parallel in history.

Some day, upon the walls of the buildings that embody this grandeur, we may hope that there will be mural decorations which in magnitude of conception and splendour of decorative treatment will adequately represent the theme.

CHAPTER XV

SUMMARY OF RESULTS

HAVING traced the various influences which have affected the development of American painting during the past fifty years, we may reasonably attempt a summary of the results. Since our art has aligned itself with that of other countries, how does it stand in comparison with theirs?

Frequently one hears the question asked in a somewhat different form. Is there yet a distinctly American school of painting; and, if so, how does it compare with other schools? But, strictly speaking, there are no longer distinct schools anywhere, since the reasons which accounted for their existence in the past no longer exist to-day. As we have seen in the previous pages, the whole trend of modern art has been toward a free-trade in motives and methods, the clearing-house of which for all the world has been Paris. Yet, while the age of close communities of artists, following some distinct tradition or influenced by some one leader, and producing work which bears the stamp of a common sentiment and manner of expression, is past, it is unquestionably true that the local con-

By Courtesy of N. B. Menzies

W. E. LATHROP

ON THE CANAL.

THIS artist is pre-eminently an interpreter of nature in her gentlest and least obtrusive mode, represented generally by subjects to which it is only sympathetic observation and delicate rendering of tonality that lend interest.

SUMMARY OF RESULTS

ditions of race temperament and natural environment do still stamp with a certain general distinction the work of each country. It is not difficult, for example, in the presence of a given picture, to be secure in the conclusion that it is Dutch or German, French or English. Is there, then, any corresponding mark by which we could feel equally sure that such and such a picture was by an American painter? I believe there is; but let us try to make this question answer itself.

The Dutch picture is readily identified; firstly, because the subject in almost every case is drawn from the natural and human life of Holland, the externals of which are so distinctly characteristic; and, secondly, because the spirit as well as the external is reproduced. The country, in fact, is small enough to have a spirit that is recognisable as characteristic. Its low-lying land and immense skies, the richness of vegetation due to the prevalence of moisture, both in rain-laden clouds overhead and in the canals and ditches that interthread the soil, the fitfulness of sunshine, now glinting crisply between the showers or lambent over the polders, now chastened by the silky atmosphere or shrouded in vapour till its light and warmth are chilled to greyiness—all these and many other conditions, so frequent and expressive, give a distinction to Holland and form the most affectionate study of her artists. They are all in love with the same mistress, and she shows to each the same changes of moods, so that their various renderings of her spirit bear a likeness to one another.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Recognising this, we see at once that there can scarcely be a similar unity of feeling in the work of American artists. Even if the devotion to the pictorial aspects of their own country were as single-hearted, the country itself presents no such compact synthesis of suggestion. Both in topographical features and in the still more significant matter of atmospheric conditions, wherein reside the moods and changes, the actual expression and spirit of the scene, the country offers a wide range of differences. The intelligent student of pictures, especially if he is also, as he should be, a student of nature, can recognise at once this scene drawn from California, that from the Middle West, another from Pennsylvania, and still another from the East. These are broad distinctions; nor are closer ones less recognisable. We use the general term New England, but the landscapes from each State in the group, both in form and feeling, differ from those of the others. When we realise this, and the further fact that it is in the subtle differentiation of these variations of natural and spiritual manifestations that the best art of to-day is displayed, we are admitting the impossibility of there being such family resemblance among American pictures as among the Dutch.

SOLITUDE

CHARLES MELVILLE DEWEY

I M AGINE the foliage of a juicy grayish green, the sky a greenish gray, and you begin to realize the feeling of the picture. It is removed from the warmth of sunlight, withdrawn into a "solitude" of feeling.

In the Collection of John Gellatly, Esq.

ALBERT L. GROT

...mer painters. His work is distinguished by the
as well as the forms of nature, and by a

SUMMARY OF RESULTS

Then, again, there is the general resemblance that may characterise the work of painters of one country through idiosyncrasy of racial temperament. We recognise, for example, in the artists grouped about Munich, a prevalence of exuberant and original imagination, and a direct and often somewhat exaggerated mode of expression; traits of the Teutonic temperament, sufficiently prevalent to make it almost possible to speak of a Munich school. But you will find no counterpart of this among American painters. If anything they are rather distinguished for the opposite: a certain kind of cosmopolitanism of feeling, and an independence of one another in their methods.

On the other hand, although it might be impossible to discover any positive indications of uniformity, certain negative resemblances are notable. It did not escape the notice of careful observers at the Paris Exposition of 1900, when there was ample opportunity of comparing the art of different countries, that that of the United States made a very separate impression. Trying to analyse it, one found one's self recurring to phrases: capability, moderation, sanity, and perhaps a lack of individualism. There was a general high standard of craftsmanship, the equivalent of which was to be found perhaps only in the French and Dutch exhibits. But, unlike the French, our artists seldom, if ever, seemed to use their technical skill with ostentation, either to display mere prowess with the brush or to attract attention by the meretricious device of a startling subject; while, on the other hand, unlike the Dutch, they failed, as a group, to suggest a marked individuality. I say as a group; for, of course, there were particular examples of notable individuality. But the general impression of the ensemble was of a moderation, grateful in comparison with the ostentation and vagaries that abounded elsewhere, but in itself open to the suggestion of being too negative a virtue, a little fibreless and lacking in marrow. To be candid, a similar lack of positive moderation may be charged against our annual exhibitions of native work. For there is all the difference in the world between a strong man, adjusting his output of strength to the work in hand, while holding a portion in reserve, and another whose moderation seems to be the result of not having an abundance of either force or conviction.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

One may find a counterpart of this in American fiction. Publishers are fond of preaching moderation. Both in illustration and in writing they discourage much that is original, vital, and born of convictions, fearing that it may shock the sensibilities of their public. Since the latter is overwhelmingly composed of young girls, they may exhibit an appropriate canniness, but the result upon a great deal of our literature is to confuse purity

WILLARD L. METCALF

*from Paris the practice of the plein nature has been his constant theme.
quality of feeling.*

Collection of the Corcoran Gallery of Art

J. FRANCIS MURPHY

is "characteristic" work, this artist nature. The present example, with forms, and distant hillside, enveloped Within this restricted range of with prudishness and sincerity with dilettanteism—to crush conviction on the part alike of author and of reader. The actual plague spot of this disease centres around the relation of the sexes in literature and the use of the nude in art, but its morbid effects spread through the whole body of fiction and painting, inducing a flacid condition of self-consciousness and insincerity. It has taken such grip of artists and public that to a considerable extent moderation has been supplanted by repression, and tamely to hold back is esteemed worthier than to put forth with a reserve of power.

SUMMARY OF RESULTS

The effect of this condition which has become fluent in the public conscience is to be discovered in our painting. For its prevalence one can scarcely blame the painters. They represent a comparatively small number of men and women, in the midst of a community impregnated with this insincerity. With a few exceptions they are unable to resist the effect of what is in the atmosphere around them; and the less so because, as illustrators, a majority of the figure-painters, at any rate, have become directly infected with the prevailing pseudo-ethics of the publishers. The necessity of prettiness, of not giving offence to "the most fastidious," and of exploiting the obvious, has been urged upon them, until it is small wonder that a great deal of American painting is characterised, if I may be allowed the expression, by irreproachable table-manners rather than by salient self-expression; by a desire to be amiable rather than convincing. The portrait-painter, for example, if he would make a living, is tempted by the vogue of the pretty face in periodicals to sacrifice truth of art and of human character to the glib exploitation of prettiness of face and form and flashiness of costume. The figure-painter will meet his readiest reward if he confine himself to subjects of trite propriety, represented with insistent regard for the obvious; while even the painter of landscape is lured into the pleasant moods of innocuous sentimentality. The taste of our time, in fact, runs to superficial sentimentality, and consciously or unconsciously the painter is apt to respond to it.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Among those who have maintained a vigorously independent course and whose pictures, whenever they appear in exhibitions, create a pronounced interest, none is more conspicuous than Gari Melchers. To a French cleverness of brushwork he has added from his frequent sojourning in Holland, a conscientiousness truly Dutch. Yet, although he has spent many years in depicting subjects of the Dutch peasantry, he has, unlike many others who have been similarly drawn to Holland, avoided all imitation of the modern Dutch technique. His own, indeed, has more kinship with that of the old Flemish painters in its enforcement

EARLY SPRING

LEONARD OCHTMAN

A MONG the artists of this country who have taken the lead in studying nature in the light of the open air, Ochtmann has won a foremost position. He is keenly sensitive to the quiet moods of nature and to the manifestations of subtle quality. Few canvases equal his in refinement and delicate tonality.

In the Collection of Louis A. Lehmaier, Esq.

SUMMARY OF RESULTS

of character, elaboration of detail, and fondness for the qualities of texture. Avoiding alike the summariness of much modern impressionism, and the perfection of finish which in a Bourguereau, for example, is so tame and unlikelike, he recognises the importance of detail in the make-up of the whole, and by his frank and resolute rendering of it gives to all his pictures a markedly individual personality. In this respect he might be ranged alongside of Thomas Eakins, for his insight of observation and fidelity of statement are correspondingly sure; but he differs from the older painter in having essentially a modern point of view. This leads him to study his figures and accessories under the effect of real light, for the most part a cool, evenly diffused light which admits of little shadow and avoids any spots of heightened piquancy. Again, it draws him into sympathy with his subject. He has put himself in touch with the lives of the people, the young peasant women and men, whom he represents, and recognises the sweetness and sadness that underly its ruggedness. His expression of this sentiment is marked by the same comprehension and fidelity to truth that distinguish his method of painting. It is as far as possible from the sentimentality that mars the work of so many painters of the peasant-subject, just as his technique is equally devoid of sloppiness and superficiality.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

This distinction, one should observe, is a measure of Melchers' own character. It is the personality of his own mental distinction, investing everything he does with original directness and scrupulous truth. The importance of this fact cannot be overstated: that character counts in painting as much as in any other department of life. But how few people seem to realise this! Because a painter must be sensitive to certain aspects, such as those of colour and form, beyond the habit of men engaged in other pursuits, they take it for granted that he must be an emotionalist at the mercy of his sensibilities, and make allowances accordingly. Yet, if we study the lives and works of artists, not in painting only, but in music, sculpture, and literature, we shall find, perhaps without exception, that the greatest results, those, I mean, that endure and most appeal to the largest number of thoughtful students, are those which are the product of sensibility controlled. Not by any means has all strong work been the output of artists physically strong; indeed, the balance, if one carefully reckoned it, might be found on the other side; but whether physically weak or strong, they have been strong in character. They have had a mental poise that sustained them, and set the standard of their endeavour and accomplishment. And the mental poise is the product of a clear and vigorous mind remaining true to itself and enlarging its scope

THE SLUICE

FREDERICK BALLARD WILLIAMS

THE landscapes of this artist are distinguished by largeness of feeling combined with a close observation of nature. While all the forms are strongly contrasted, he excels in the drawing of turbulent water. His coloring is full of quality, and the lighting effects are admirably done.

GARI MELCHERS

way of prettiness, the picture might acceptance of the facts hension.

SUMMARY OF RESULTS

by contact with what is sane and true in surrounding art and life.

It is on this ground that art and morality really meet; namely, in the person of the artist himself. For I will not admit that view held by many, that art must be moral in its purpose and suggestion; by which, apparently, it is meant that art must directly assist the cause of morality by presenting subjects in which the virtue of morality is explicitly set forth. Although, at one time, art did splendid service for the church in picturing the truth of doctrine and the beauty of the Bible story and of holy living, that was only one of the glorious incidents in its career. But the real domain of the arts is not that of the preacher, the philosopher, or the moralist. It is to make known, not the beauty of holiness, but the holiness of beauty, to a world overmuch occupied with the material or purely intellectual sides of life. It is, if you will, to sanctify the senses by drawing them off from merely carnal and material gratification, to a realisation of the abstract essence of beauty that pervades nature and human life. Viewed in this light, it is as important a factor in the betterment of the whole man, the body, mind, and soul that are in all of us, as are the labours of the preacher, the philosopher, the moralist, and the purveyors of the material necessities and embellishments of life. The labours of all are necessary to the nurturing of the whole man, of the full life. They work mutually, and often in aim and result impinge upon one another's domains. But each is separate.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Yet, even if this be so, there is a definite alliance between art and morality, if by the latter we understand the being true to what is best in us and the reaching after the best of which we are capable. And the highest form of this, as I have already hinted, is based upon superior mental qualities, controlled by strength of mind. A man may be faithful unto death, but unless his acts are prompted and controlled by strength of mind, his faithfulness differs in degree, perhaps, but not in quality, from that of a dog. It would be idle to affirm that mental form is of small account in the qualification of a preacher, a philosopher, or a business man. All our experience is to the contrary. Yet in an artist we customarily overlook both the need and the lack of it, and are content to regard him as a chartered emotionalist. His training tends to affirm the emotionalist in himself. Early discovering an aptitude for drawing and a peculiar sensitiveness to beauty, he enters upon a course of instruction, too much limited to the promotion of these qualities, and escapes from rough contact with men and things and the discipline which it involves. He learns, not to repress, but to express himself; to take his feelings as a guide to conduct, and to nurse and pamper them as his most

GARI MELCHERS

...herdess, only now it is not heavy hood.

Academy of Fine Arts, Philadelphia

SUMMARY OF RESULTS

valuable assets in life. But in art, as in other vocations of life, it is the man who is endowed with intellectuality and by self-discipline preserves the integrity of this endowment, that accomplishes the vital thing. He is in his treatment of himself a moral man, and his morality is declared in the poise and vigour of his art.

It would be obviously out of place in a work of this kind to cite all the men who seem to one's self, as Gari Melchers does, to represent this union of artistic sensibility with intellectual integrity. To attempt such a thing would be to pass a very serious slight upon the names omitted; and it has been my intention to avoid as far as possible all personalities. Yet, because of the general comment that it suggests, I will cite one other instance, that of a younger painter, whose work so far has not received the consideration to which it seems to me entitled. He is Robert David Gauley, a pupil of F. W. Benson and Edmund C. Tarbell in Boston, and of Bouguereau and Ferrier in Paris. Subsequently he studied Velasquez in Madrid, and worked and studied in Holland. This variety of influences and the resolute personality of Gauley himself may account in part for the slowness of his acceptance by the public.

The latter is more readily attracted to a painter whose style it can identify immediately, whereas this one has been assimilating his impressions with deliberation, experimenting in various methods of technique, and holding himself back from the acquisition of any formula or fixed mode of painting. Thus the public is thwarted in its quite intelligible satisfaction of being able to exclaim, as it visits an exhibition: "Look, that is a Gauley!" On the other hand, he may fail to attract general attention because there is nothing of the obvious in his pictures, none of those elegant little irrelevances of costume or pose which so gladden the superficial amateur of art. The ideal toward which he is working is by contrast a severe one. It involves in the matter of composition a search for choiceness as well as dignity of line, and for a movement or pose of the figure that unites subtlety with simplicity. A corresponding subtlety and choiceness distinguish the expression of the whole. The jealousy with which he tries to keep his art pure of any meretriciousness determines his attitude toward his sitter. Whether the latter be a man or woman, he approaches his subject with a reverence none too usual in the portrait painter.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

For, in the presence of so many portraits, especially of women, one is conscious of a lack of reverence in the mental attitude of the painter. Frequently the subject, for all her finery, or possibly because so much stress has been put upon it, does not even look like a lady. She has been made to flaunt her person and costume upon one's notice the distinguished portrait.

ROBERT DAVID GAULEY

ROBERT DAVID GAULEY

SUMMARY OF RESULTS

after the fashion of those who go to market with their personal wares. This blatant form of vulgarity, not uncommon in the portraits by foreigners, is, it must be acknowledged, rarely seen in those by Americans. Their tendency in this direction is confined for the most part to a preoccupation with frippery and to an exploitation of skill of painting for its own sake. The result may be not so blatantly vulgar, but it none the less indicates irreverence. And, mark you, irreverence on the part of a painter toward the manhood or womanhood of his subject is irreverence toward what at least should be sacred to him—his own art. For peculiarly true of the painter's case is that old saying of Novalis: "There is but one temple in the universe, and that is the body of man." Human nature, its fabric of flesh and its indwelling spirit, is the highest object of the artist's study, the richest treasury of his artistic ideals. If he hold it in little honour, the price he pays is the prostitution of his art. But for this prostitution, to the existence of which in American painting the thoughtful student cannot shut his eyes, the American public is in part responsible. One could name painters whose ideals were true enough at the start, but who have been driven on to the streets of easy virtue by hard conditions. The public demand for honest art is so small, the reward it offers to meretriciousness so cordial and handsome. Why not? You cannot make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. A society sprawling on materialism and wallowing in ostentatious display—what should it care for, or even know of, choiceness of taste and reverence for what is true in art? Naturally, since it pays the piper, it calls the kind of tune it likes; and the piper accordingly must debauch his art or step aside and rot. Under such circumstances the artist needs to have a more than commonly stout heart to continue to be true to himself and to preserve confidence in a saving residue of taste in the public.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

For that there is such a residue one knows. While present American conditions in the gross are not favourable to the highest possibilities of native art, here, there, and everywhere throughout the country knowledge and taste are growing, and the still, small voice of true appreciation is gathering volume. It is on people with knowledge enough to dare to have opinions of their own, and with the taste that can distinguish between what is meretricious and what is sterling, that the future of American art depends.

CHAPTER XVI

SUMMARY CONTINUED

IN the previous chapter I touched upon some of the insidious effects of the popular taste for prettiness. These, it is to be anticipated, will pass away as the American public grows in serious appreciation of what is truly beautiful in art. But even then there will remain another phase of the matter which is likely to be of perennial interest, since it strikes at the roots of our conceptions of beauty. Stated bluntly, it involves the question: How far is the conception of beauty in art compatible with ugliness?

At the outset the two ideas seem to be mutually antagonistic, and so they are reckoned by those who narrow their conceptions of beauty to the ideal purity of Greek sculpture of the golden age, and to the subsequent work of Roman, Renaissance, and later times that tried to emulate it. With all such the ideal is to render form and feeling in the harmony of a perfect poise, to exclude the individual or irregular, and to imagine and suggest an abstract ideal of perfection. But in actual life absolute perfection of form is not to be found, still less a complete harmony of poise between the physical, the intellectual, and the emotional. Exception both to one and to the other is the rule. So the question eternally cropping up, eternally unsolved, arises out of the artist's attitude toward life. Does he regard life itself as the end and object of his study, or merely as a rich mine from which he may extract ore to fashion it into creations of his own imagination? In the latter case he will strive to improve upon nature, in the former to represent it as it is. These two ideals of art differ so widely that it is difficult for the artists who embrace the one to have much sympathy with those in the opposite camp. For the layman, however, there need be no such difficulty, because his detachment from any preoccupation with technique enables him to view the matter from outside. Doing so, he may, if he has clear eyes, find truth in both directions. Many a layman will reach his conclusions somewhat in this fashion:

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

To him it seems that life is the thing of supreme importance; art being but one of the sources of higher living. He thinks of art as a magic mirror in which life is reflected, and looks to find in it a heightened impression of the things of sight, as a suggestion to the spirit or sense-imagination of the things not seen. If the mirror only gives back a repeated vision of what he can see with his own eyes, he is disappointed, for in this case art has added nothing to nature. There is no heightening of impression, no stimulus to imagination or spirit.

OWARD J. CUSHING

whose work is characterized by refined color sense,

SUMMARY OF RESULTS

He may admire the skill or fidelity with which this vision has been produced, even as he admires the craftsmanship involved in the mechanism of a piece of machinery, but for him in neither case is there any evidence of creation. The mechanic, whether his tool be the brush or turning lathe, is but engaged in reproducing; he is not an inventor. And the painter is only an inventor, a creator, if he has the artist's vision, by means of which our own may be kindled to a heightened sense of beauty.

By the time that we have learned to demand this of a painter, and to refuse him the higher title of artist, unless he comply with it, our whole attitude toward pictures is changed. Especially do we cease to concern ourselves much with the subject of the picture. The most exalted subject will not of itself impress us. It is not the subject, but the artist's vision of it, which affects us. A pumpkin, rendered by that great French master of still-life, Vollon, may move us deeply, where an elaborate figure composition leaves us cold. And why? Because Vollon's pumpkin becomes, as it were, a symbol through which we receive a heightened impression of the sumptuousness and subtlety of nature's colouring, the vitalising power of light, and the opulence of nature's productive vigour. Our own sensibility is enriched; for the moment, at least, we live more abundantly. And for this effect upon ourselves we are indebted to the artist's vision, which he has enabled us to share through his power to give it technical expression.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

But if he is endowed with these qualifications of vision and expression, the artist can look upon nature and life and find in them occasions of beauty, overlooked by ordinary eyes. He will even discover beauty lurking in ugliness, or by his treatment of the latter will transmute it into a form of beauty. For, in the first place, what do we ourselves understand by ugliness? Have we in mind some such exaggerated type of physical formation as that of a toad or spider-crab, or, to take another extreme instance, that of a man of the slums who is morally as well as physically deteriorated, offensive alike to our senses and our conscience? But, as to nature's form of so-called ugliness, I doubt if there be one, however abnormal in comparison with our ordinary standards of comeliness, but has some quality of colouring or of movement that to the searching eye of the artist's vision may not be able to yield suggestion of beauty, which his technical skill will evolve into expression. The Japanese, in their carvings, lacquers, and prints, have abundantly illustrated this. As to the slum-man, we may turn from him with repugnance, but it is precisely to him that the Salvation Army turns, in its conviction that somewhere latent in him is still a possibility of goodness. Similarly an artist may turn to him as a source of artistic inspiration. If essentially, even if not too obviously, ing of the picture. It is, rather,

HUGO BALLIN

the usual.

CHARLES W. HAWTHORSE of effect is alleviated in the original by the forms of the fish are rendered. The fish has yet to find himself. That he will do so, the men discover that brushwork does not he does so, he has the excellent precedent, among others, of Rembrandt and Velasquez. Shall we venture to deny to those artists a sense of beauty, or shall we reconstruct our notion of beauty so as to include their example? I think the latter will seem the wiser plan. The notion, then, of beauty, so extended, involves character; both expression of character and character of expression. Character implies something distinctive, individual, so far abnormal that it is a deviation from the general run, and still more so from the abstract type. It is, for example, the quality conspicuous in a locust tree, so unexpectedly original in its growth, as compared with the exquisitely balanced grace of an American elm. Really one might venture to illustrate the difference between the academic understanding of beauty, and the extended acceptance of it to include character, by the comparison of these two trees.

SUMMARY OF RESULTS

But it must be remembered that the artist comprehends character as a functional quality. He deals primarily with externals, and, while he may not be unconscious of the psychological import of character, it is primarily its effect upon the physical aspect that he notes and renders. If he is really a nature-student, it is character in a human being, affecting the latter's form, the functions of the limbs and joints, the disposition and texture of the flesh, the very kind and carrying of the clothes, that form a large portion of his study. Or, if he is a landscape painter, the effect of permanent environment and temporary conditions upon the forms of objects. Always he feels the forces working through nature and declaring themselves in form. It is the beauty of nature's law of cause and effect, illustrated in a myriad aspects, that attracts him, rather than man's invention of an abstract perfection of beauty. And it is because that law is working in the slum-man that he claims the right, if he will, to make him the subject of artistic study. We may shudder at the evidences of functional degradation presented in the picture, but do not let us forget that there are the physical and moral counterparts of this in the tragedies of Œdipus and Othello. But, you will say, these are clothed in a splendour of diction that dignifies the theme. Quite so, and it is precisely a corresponding splendour of technical presentation that justifies the treatment of horrible subjects in pictures. There should be character of expression as well as expression of character.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

The foregoing analysis of the place of so-called ugliness in art has been suggested by the effort of a few of our younger painters to shake themselves free from the fetters of prettiness and sentimentality in which much American art is confined. They are men who are interested in life as well as art, and who use the one to interpret the other.

SPANISH FETE

F. LUIS MORA

THIS clever young painter, who first made his mark as an illustrator and is now painting pictures, is of Spanish extraction and has studied much in Spain. He has here chosen the costume period of the early nineteenth century, but more usually his subjects are drawn from modern life, and are distinguished by vivid characterization, easy and vivacious action, and sparkle of color. Their weakest point hitherto has been a lack of atmosphere and real appearance of light.

JOHN SLOAN

The subject has been felt as well as seen, and the artist selects for emphasis just what is needed on the artist's own mind.

SUMMARY OF RESULTS

One of these is John Sloan, a native of Philadelphia, and a pupil of the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts. He is now a resident of New York, whose crowded avenues, especially on the West Side, supply the subjects of his choice. For it is what the Japanese call the "Ukiyoye" that attracts him—the "passing show" of shops and streets, overhead and surface traffic, and the moving throngs of people, smart and squalid, sad and merry—a phantasmagoria of changing colour, form, and action. Out of the multiplied features of the scene, by eliminating some and emphasising others, he produces a synthesis of effect, in which confusion has disappeared, but the suggestion of vivid actuality remains. His pictures are excellent examples of modern impressionism; but, while the rendering of the spectacle presented to the eye is his first concern, his mind also is busy with the human comedy and tragedy that beats below the surface. It is the humanity of the scene, as well as its pictorial suggestions, that interests him. Not, however, in the way of telling a definite story, but by inference and suggestion. It is an impression of the human interest that he has received, and he renders it impressionistically. A writer, for example, if he were attracted by one of these scenes with its incidental suggestion, might make it the subject of a story, inventing a past and present for the personages and a sequel to what they are engaged in; investing them and the situation with detailed motive and conduct, and elaborating a dénouement. Many a painter also, mostly of the old-fashioned kind, might attempt to force upon your attention a corresponding definition of detailed incident. But he would operate under the serious limitation of being able to represent only one single phase of the story. Sloan, like other impressionists, recognising this limitation, avoids all competition with the verbal artist, and renders exclusively a painter's impression both of the scene and of its underlying human interest. He grasps the actual moment of appearance and suggestion.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

In the rendering of these scenes line is superseded by masses; the whole is viewed as a collection of coloured patches, differing in hues, in the amount of light which they receive, and in the quantity of atmosphere which intervenes between them and the eye of the observer. Is it necessary to add that this impressionistic vision is, after all, the normal way in which the eye receives impressions of a scene? We are not conscious of hard lines enclosing objects, but of contours more or less blurred and blending; forming masses of light and dark, or of light and less light, of various hues and shapes. But in the actual scene, especially if it be laid in a crowded thoroughfare, flanked by the irregularities of buildings, the masses, both in their variety and shape, will present a good deal of the

GEORGE LUKS

...istence force themselves upon one. It is
 ...ay, a city choked with snow — the only
 The conditions are monstrous, a modern ... remarkable way the young painter has
 ... seem a very ordinary scene.

SUMMARY OF RESULTS

bizarrerie of a crazy quilt. It is a part of the artist's vision to draw these conflicting elements into a harmony of colour, lighting, tone, and atmosphere; so that the impression rendered may be one of artistic ensemble. By the time that the work has gone through the artist's two processes of receiving and rendering his impressions, it will partake of the unity of his own individuality and temperament. It will still give a suggestion of variety and busy action, but the different features of activity will be busy toward a common end, the modes of variety will be harmonised. The scene itself, composed of a great number of independent units, will have become unified into a picture that represents the impression of a single mind.

Now, our appreciation of the picture will depend, not only upon the artist's ability to create this ensemble of impression, but upon our own willingness to accept it. We may fail of the latter for two reasons: a general dislike of the impressionistic method, or a particular one of the kind of subject affected by Sloan and others. With neither is it any use to argue, since likes and dislikes are largely the product of temperament. Yet, if possible, they should be fortified by judgment, based upon understanding. Especially should this be the case in the matter of impressionism, since it plays so large a part in modern art.

Our understanding and possible appreciation of

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

it depends entirely—to go back to the point from which we started—upon our attitude toward the relation between art and life. For some painters the call of life is so urgent and alluring that they are not satisfied to make pictures about life, but try to render life in their pictures. The distinction is an important one. In the one case the scene within the frame, having had its origin in the desire to make a picture, continues to affect us as a picture, while in the other case we may be made to forget the canvas, paint, and frame, and find ourselves looking, as through a window, out upon a pageant of real life. Has this a fascination for us, as it had for the painter? We may agree that it has, and yet demur to the kind of life that the painter has chosen to render. If so, we are again brought back to the attitude of art toward life. Shall the painter confine his study to idealising life, or at least to presenting only its comely aspects, or may he have the whole run of life for his field, as the writer has; trusting to the sincerity of his purpose and the beauty of his technique to justify the ugliness of his theme? Whatever may be our individual answer to this question, let us recognise that the work of Sloan and a few others, such as Robert Henri, C. W. Hawthorne, William G. Glackens, Jerome Myers, and George Luks, is a natural and wholesome reaction from the vogue of frippery, tameness, and sentimentality. It has, however, its

NEW ENGLAND FARM IN WINTER

Copyright, 1905, by N. E. Montross

DWIGHT W. TRYON

BORN in New York, 1840, Tryon went abroad in 1876, studying under Daubigny, and painting also in Holland, Italy, and the Channel Islands. His style is a very personal one, based upon a rigidly conscientious observation of the physical facts of nature. But there he penetrates with a poetical imagination that veils the fact with a suggestion of spirituality.

SUMMARY OF RESULTS

own inherent shortcoming when it reveals a tendency to be overoccupied with the appearances of life, and makes little or no appeal to the imagination or spirit. Based practically, if not avowedly, upon the assumption that "seeing is believing," that the painter's domain is that of the eye, it may easily ignore the at least equally important aspect of life which is made up of things not seen. It may take no account of the mystery that is in us and everywhere about us. It may be in its own superior way an exploitation of the obvious.

One should understand that its appearance in American painting is rather belated; for it is but repeating what Courbet and Manet did for the refreshment and invigoration of French art forty years ago. They, however, were the leaders in painting of the theories and practices entertained by the writers of the period; and painters and writers alike were a part of the realistic movement that was affecting the thought of the time. But since then the wheel has revolved; realism is no longer a motive; it is now only one of other means to an end. People, indeed, have grown a little weary of the diet, discovering that they cannot live by bread alone. Once more the spiritual needs of man are awake and calling to be fed. Abroad, especially in Germany, the more progressive of the painters have realised this reaction from materialism, and are responding to it. It is for a similar recognition and response on the part of the painters of this country that we are waiting.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

Not that American painting can show no example of such progress. In a previous chapter we have noted that, while Whistler may be studied under many aspects, the most important and abiding one was his habit of evolving from material appearances their essence, the intangible element in them—in fact, the spirituality inherent in matter. The same is true of Thayer, Dewing, Lockwood, and some others among figure-painters. In their diverse ways these artists have treated the actual appearance as a symbol of moods and apprehensions of the imagination and spirit. A similar tendency may also be detected in a few of our landscape painters, notably in Twachtman, Winslow Homer, Dwight W. Tryon, Edward T. Steichen, and Ben Foster. Broadly speaking, however, the prevailing characteristic of American painting is materialistic rather than spiritual.

That the latter quality is necessary for the highest form of expression in modern art seems to me undeniable. For there was a time when spirituality and religion were practically one. The cravings of the spirit grew out of and found expression in the religious consciousness; and those were the great days of painting. The common and collective need of the people was to have its faith and soul-experiences bodied forth by art in terms of

MOONLIGHT

By Charles of N. E. Montrose

DWIGHT W. FAYON

A PICTURE full of the mystery of night, the great hush of nature, and its tender invocation to the spirit.

[illegible]

SUMMARY OF RESULTS

religion; and the artists, whether as men they were religious or not, responded to the need with a nobility of design and execution, the influence of which extended also to the portrayal of subjects not religious. But in our time religion and spirituality, if not exactly divorced, are at least very far from being one. Much religion is mainly a system of doctrine and ethics; a great deal of spirituality exists among people not attracted to any specific formula of religion. This general lack of union between spirituality and religion is of itself quite sufficient to account for the absence of noble religious art in these days. There exists no common and collective need demanding it and making it possible. Since, then, modern art is debarred by circumstances from revealing the great art of the past along the latter's own lines, the question arises: Can it find some new motive growing out of the conditions of the present? Only, I feel assured, if a common and collective recognition of the claims of the spirit results in a need on the part of the public, so strong as to encourage and compel its realisation in art.

Belief in humanity is the practical religion of to-day, and it works for man's physical, material, and intellectual uplifting. But, as a motive for art, its influence is almost purely materialistic and sensuous. It is only when this new religion shall become impregnated with a correspondingly practical belief in the facts of spirit, that the possibilities of a great art in modern times will arise. Symptoms of this new movement, as I have said, can already be detected in American painting. Whether they shall multiply and replenish the earth depends in a final analysis upon the public.

STORY OF AMERICAN PAINTING

INDEX

- Abbey, Edwin A., 190
 His career, 193
 Mural decoration, 194
Trial of Katherine of Aragon, 195
 Mural decoration, 320
Quest of the Holy Grail, 320
 Academic characteristics, 165
 Academic style, 122
 Academic training, 164
 Adams, Samuel, 15
Adirondack Vista, An, Alexander H. Wyant, 201
Against the Sky, F. W. Benson, 264
 Albany, mural decorations for Capitol of, 307
 Alexander Cosmo, 35
Alexander, Portrait of Miss, James A. McNeill Whistler, 298
 Alexander, John W., 254
Mrs. Hastings, Portrait of, 259
 Mural decoration, 325
Pittsburgh, 318
 Allen, Thomas, 163
 Allston, Washington, 56
 Career, 57
 Analysis of paintings, 60
Spanish Girl, 57
Dead Man Restored to Life, 58
All's Well, Winslow Homer, 187
 American Glass, 156
American School, The, Matthew Pratt, 28
Arcadia, H. Siddons Mowbray, 176
Ariadne, Wyatt Eaton, 169
Ariadne, John Vanderlyn, 62
 Armstrong, D. Maitland, 163
 Art for Art's Sake, 123, 258, 330
Artist in Museum, C. W. Peale, 34
Artist's Mother, The, James A. McNeill Whistler, 293 Ascension, The, John La Farge, 309 Atmosphere, 152, 241
Autumn, John La Farge, 157
Ave Maria, Horatio Walker, 227
 Ballin, Hugo, Europa Sibyl, 367
 Barbizon School, influence of, 77, 124, 139, 144, 198, 200, 204, 206, 214, 229
 Museum of Fine Arts, 160
Bathers, The, William Morris Hunt, 132
Battle of Bunker Hill, John Trumbull, 52
 Beauty and Ugliness, 366
 Beaux, Cecilia, 254
Adelaide Nutting, Portrait of, 256
 Beckwith, J. Carroll, 163
 Belzons, M., 88
 Benson, Frank W., 254
Against the Sky, 264
Calm Morning, 268
 Berkeley, Bishop, 5
 Bierstadt, Albert, 78
 Painting analysed, 81
Yosemite Valley, 80
 Blakelock, Ralph A., 214
 Style analysed, 217
Brook by Moonlight, 215
 Blashfield, Edwin H., 163
 Mural decoration, 319
Minnesota, 321
Washington Relinquishing Office, 325
 Blum, Robert F., 163

INDEX

- Bonnat, 164
 Boston in Colonial Times, 15
 Decoration of Trinity Church, 304
 Public Library, 194, 313, 320, 323
 Boughton, George H., 186
 Bouguereau, 164
 Boulanger, 164
Boy and Butterfly, William Morris Hunt, 131
Boys with Fish, C. W. Hawthorne, 368
 Bracquemond, 288
 Bridgman, Frederick Arthur, 163
Brook by Moonlight, The, Ralph A. Blakelock, 215
 Brown, John G., 97
 Career, 99
 Analysis of pictures, 99
 Street boys, 101
 Heels over Head, 96
 Brush, George de Forest, 163
 Analysis of pictures, 177
 Study of Indians, 177
 Silence Broken, 178
 Mourning Her Brave, 178
 Domestic theme, 181
 The Sculptor and the King, 179
 Portrait Group, 180
Burning of the Peggy Stewart, C. Y. Turner, 317
 Cabanel, 164
Calm before a Storm, Allen B. Talcott, 243
Calm Morning, A, Frank W. Benson, 268
 Camp, Joseph de, 257
Caritas, Abbott H. Thayer, 184
Carlyle, Portrait of Thomas, James A. McNeill Whistler, 294
 Carnegie Institute, Pittsburgh, decoration, 325
Castaway, The, Winslow Homer, 236
 Centennial Exposition, 159
 Central Park, 160
 Chase, Adelaide Cole, 254
 Chase, William M., 114
 Method of teaching, 117
 Lady with White Shawl, 116
 Member of Society of American Artists, 163
 Portraits, 254
 Chicago World's Fair, 313
Christ and Nicodemus, John La Farge, 148
 Church, F. E., 78
 Cotopaxi, 83
 Classic figures, 173
 Classic landscape, 123
Cloud, The, A. L. Groll, 338
 Cole, Thomas, 66
 Early life, 69
 Paintings analysed, 70, 75
 Expulsion from Paradise, 68
 Destruction, 67
 Colonial Times, 2
 Moral atmosphere of, 6
 Painters of, 10
Connecticut Valley, Alexander H. Wyant, 196
 Cooper, Colin Campbell, Pittsburgh, Pa., 334
 Copley, John Singleton, 10
 Early life, 11
 Character of portraits, 16, 21
 Marriage, 21
 Departure for Europe, 21
 Historical pictures, 22
 Work compared with Stuart's, 44
 Lady Wentworth, Portrait of, 14
 Mr. and Mrs. Izzard, Portrait of, 19
 Col. Epes Sargent, Portrait of, 20
 Copley, Richard, 12
Cotopaxi, F. E. Church, 83
 Courbet, Gustave, 229, 278, 381
 Couture, French Academician, 126
 Cox, Kenyon, 163
 Mural decoration, 323
 Arts and Sciences, 324
 Crane, Bruce, 163

INDEX

- Cushing, Howard G., The Silver Gown, 363
- Daniel Webster, Portrait of*, C. Harding, 92
- Dead Man Restored to Life*, Washington Allston, 58
- Degas, 288
- DeLancy, Miss Alice, 21
- Destruction*, Thomas Cole, 67
- Dewey, Charles Melville, Solitude, 337
- Dewing, Thomas W., 185, 382
Types analysed, 189
The Spinnet, 188
Le Jaseur, 191
La Pêche, 192
- Dielman, Frederick, 113
- Diez, professor at Munich, 113
- Dr. Fothergill, Portrait of*, Gilbert Stuart, 40
- Dogma of Redemption*, John S. Sargent, 322
- Dougherty, Paul A., Sea and Rocks, 240
- Doughty, Thomas, 66
On the Hudson, 74
- Dumping Snow*, G. Luks, 375
- Duran, Carolus, 117
His method, 164
- Durand, Asher B., 71
Paintings analysed, 71
Landscape, 73
- Düsseldorf, 76, 87, 103, 109
- Dutch Picture, The, 335
- Duveneck, Frank, 114
Career, 114
Method of painting, 114
Well and Water Tank, 112
Elizabeth Boott Duveneck, 115
Member of Society of American Artists, 163
- Duveneck, Portrait of Elizabeth Boott*, F. Duveneck, 115
- Eakins, Thomas, 230, 347
Career, 231
- Surgical Clinic*, 228, 231
Style analysed, 232
- Eaton, Wyatt, 171
Ariadne, 169
- Early Moonrise*, George Inness, 138
- Early Spring*, Leonard Ochtman, 345
- East Side Picture*, Jerome Myers, 376
- Easter Eve*, J. Sloan, 372
- École des Beaux Arts*, 123, 312
- Edwards, Jonathan, 6
Influence on moral atmosphere, 6
- Elliott, Charles Loring, 88
Career, 94
Portrait of the Artist, 95
- English Influence, 85, 87, 97
- Europa Sibyl*, H. Ballin, 367
- Expulsion from Paradise*, Thomas Cole, 68
- Fantin-Latour, 288
- Farm in Winter, The*, J. Alden Weir, 275
- February*, J. H. Twachtman, 284
- Feet Washers, The*, W. B. Van Ingen, 310
- Fire Worshipers*, Homer Martin, 211
- Fitz, B. R., 171
Analysis of picture, 171
The Reflection, 170
- Flying Dutchman, The*, Albert P. Ryder, 219
- Foster, Ben, 382
- Fothergill, Portrait of Dr.*, Gilbert Stuart, 40
- Fowler, Frank, 163
- French Influence, 121, 159
- French Vogue, 167
- Fuller, George, 163
Career, 221
Pictures analysed, 226
- Gauley, Robert David, 355
Portrait of a Lady, 357

INDEX

- Lady with Muff*, 358
 Genre picture, 77, 94, 97
Gentlewoman, Portrait of a, J. Alden Weir, 272
 Gérôme, 164, 176
 Gibson, Charles Dana, 182
 Gifford, Robert Swain, 163
Girl and Pets, Eastman Johnson, 108
Girls Reading, Edmund C. Tarbell, 271
 Glackens, William G., 378
 Gleyre, 288
Goelet, Portrait of Beatrice, John S. Sargent, 247
Golden Age, The, John La Farge, 142
Grand Style, 21, 60, 65
 Groll, Albert L., The Cloud, 338
Gross, Portrait of Dr., Thomas Eakins, 228

Hagar and Ishmael, Benjamin West, 8
Hamilton, Portrait of, John Trumbull, 51
 Harding, Chester, 88
 Career, 93
 Portrait of Daniel Webster, 92
 Harrison, Alexander, 265
 Analysis of pictures, 265
 The Wave, 267
 Harrison, Birge, 163
 Hart, William and James McDougal, 76
 Early life, 76
 Scene at Naponach, 79
 Hassam, Childe, 277
 Rainy Night, 280
 Lorelei, 279
 Orchard Oriole, 276
Hastings, Portrait of Mrs., John Alexander, 259
 Hawthorne, C. W., 378
 Boys with Fish, 368
Heels over Head, J. G. Brown, 96
Hemlock Pool, J. H. Twachtman, 283

 Henri, Robert, 378
 Lady in Black, 263
 Herter, Albert, mural decorations, 325
 Agriculture and Commerce, 325
 Hesselius, Gustavus, 5
 Teacher of Peale, 30
 Hogarth's picture dramas, 97
 Homer, Winslow, 185
 Alf's Well, 187
 Career, 233
 Analysis of style, 234
 West Wind, 235
 The Castaway, 236
 Hovenden, Thomas, 163
 Last Moments of John Brown, 185
Hudson, On the, Thomas Doughty, 74
 Hudson River School, 66
 Its place in history, 75
 Hunt, Richard Morris, 312
 Hunt, William Morris, 123
 Career, 125
 Influenced by Millet, 128
 His many pupils, 129
 Mother and Child, 120
 Boy and Butterfly, 131
 The Bathers, 132
 Mural decorations, 134, 307
 Teacher of La Farge, 150
 The Flight of Night, 308
 The Discoverer, 308
 Hunter, Dr. William, 35

Ice Cutters, Horatio Walker, 220
 Ideal, 128, 173, 282
 Spiritual and Physical, 182
 Impressionism, 266, 277, 286, 289, 377
 Impressionists, 152, 238
 Inman, Henry, 88
 Style of painting, 89
 Career, 90
 Inness, George, 123, 198
 Career, 134
 Influence of Barbizon, 135

INDEX

- Painting analysed, 140
Midsummer, 137
Early Moonrise, 138
Peace and Plenty, 141
 ✓ Inness, George, Jr., 163
Interlude, An, Sargent Kendall, 239
Izzard, Portrait of Mr. and Mrs., J. S. Copley, 19
- Japanese Art, 285, 289
Jaseur, Le, T. W. Dewing, 191
 Johnson, Eastman, 103
 Career, 106
 Pictures analysed, 109
 Girl and Pets, 108
 Two Men, 111
 Member of Society of American Artists, 163
 Johnston, J. Humphreys, Mysteries of Night, 364
 Jones, Francis C., 163
 Jones, H. Bolton, 163
- Keeper of the Threshold, The*, Elihu Vedder, 175
 Kendall, Sargent, An Interlude, 239
 Kensett, J. F., 71, 72
Kitty, Portrait of Miss, J. J. Shannon, 255
- Lady in Black*, R. Henri, 263
Lady Wentworth, Portrait of, John S. Copley, 14
Lady with White Shawl, W. M. Chase, 116
Lady with Muff, R. D. Gauley, 358
 La Farge, John, 123
 Career, 144
 Study of Light, 151
 Study of Glass, 154
 The Battle Window, 155
 The Wolf Charmer, 153
 The Golden Age, 142
- Pomona*, 147
Christ and Nicodemus, 148
Autumn, 157
 Elected President of Society of American Artists, 163
 Mural decoration in Church of St. Thomas, 308
The Ascension, 309
 General decoration, 312
Lake George, Edward J. Steichen, 384
Landscape, A. B. Durand, 73
Landscape, H. W. Ranger, 212
 Lathrop, Francis, 163
 On the Canal, 333
 Lefebvre, 164
 Legros, 288
 Lenox, James, 90
Leslie, Portrait of Eliza, T. Sully, 91
 Lessing, 105
 Leutze, Emanuel, 76, 103
 Career, 105
 Washington Crossing the Delaware, 107
 Library of Congress, decoration of the dome of, 319
Light, 151, 270
 Limner, 2
Local Color, 151
 Lockwood, Wilton, 257, 382
 Portrait, 260
Lorelei, C. Hassam, 279
Lovell, Portrait of John, John Simbert, 7
 Low, Will H., 163
 The Portrait, 158
 Luks, George, 378
 Dumping Snow, 375
- Malbone, Edward S., 59
 Manet, 152, 237, 265, 381
Marquand, Portrait of Mr. Henry G., John S. Sargent, 248
 Martin, Homer D., 198
 Career, 203
 Analysis of method, 204

INDEX

- Old Church in Normandy*, 202
Westchester Hills, 207
View on the Seine, 208
Five Worshippers, 211
 Sentiment of landscape, 209
May Night, W. L. Metcalf, 341
 Maynard, George W., 163
 Study at Antwerp, 164
 Melchers, Gari, 344
 Paintings analysed, 347
Shepherdess, 350
Mother and Child, 353
Sailor and Sweetheart, 354
 Metcalf, W. L., May Night, 341
 Metropolitan Museum, 140, 160
Meyer, Portrait of Mrs. Carl,
 John S. Sargent, 244
Midsommer, George Inness, 137
 Millet, Frank D., 163
 Study at Antwerp, 164
 Mural decorations, 326
Treaty of the Traverse des Siouz, 327
 Millet, Jean François, 127
 Milieu, 266, 277
Minnesota, Edwin H. Blashfield, 321
 Minor, C., 214
 Monet, 273
 Monticelli, 221
Moonlight, Dwight Tryon, 383
 Mora, F. Luis, Spanish Fête, 371
 Morality and Art, 351
 Moran, Thomas, 78
Shoshone Falls, 84
 Moreland, 98
Mother and Child, Gari Melchers, 353 Mother and Child, William Morris Hunt, 120
 Mowbray, H. Siddons, Arcadia, 176
 Munich, 103, 110, 117, 339
 Mural Painting, 304
 Characteristics of, 319
 Murphy J. Francis, Road to the Old Farm, 342
 Museum of Fine Arts, Boston, 160
Music Room, The, James A. Mc-Neill Whistler, Frontispiece, 301
 Myers, Jerome, 378
East Side Picture, 376
Mysteries of the Night, J. Humphreys Johnston, 364
Naponach, Scene at, W. Hart, 79
 National Academy of Design, founded, 32
 Dissensions of revolutionaries, 162
New England Farm in Winter,
 Dwight Tryon, 379
 New York, DeWitt Clinton High School, 326
 Manhattan Hotel, 325
Nicodemus, Visit of, J. La Farge, 148
 Niemeyer, John H., 163
Normandy, Old Church in, H.
 Martin, 202
Nutting, Portrait of Adelaide,
 Cecilia Beaux, 256
 Ochtman, Leonard, Early Spring,
 345
Old Church in Normandy, H. Martin, 202
On the Canal, F. Lathrop, 333
 Opalescent Glass, 154, 312
Orchard Oriole, Childe Hassam, 276
 Otis, 15
 Palmer, Walter L., 163
 Paul, St., Capitol, 325
 Paris Exposition, 339
Paysage Intime, 71
Peace and Plenty, G. Inness, 141
Peale, C. W., Portrait of, Benjamin West, 13
 Peale, Charles Wilson, 10
 Career, 29
 Joins the army, 30
 Analysis of portraits, 31

INDEX

- Co-operates in founding Pennsylvania Academy, 32
 Work compared with Stuart's, 42
Portrait of Washington, 33
Artist in Museum, 34
Pêche, La, T. W. Deming, 192
Peggy Stewart, Burning of the, C. Y. Turner, 317
 Pelham, Peter, 2
 Marries mother of John S. Copley, 15
 Pennington, Mr., teacher of West, 10
 Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, founded, 32
 Philadelphia, 23.
 Ascendancy of, 24
 Academy of Fine Arts, 32
 Centennial Exposition, 159
Piano, At the, James A. McNeill Whistler, 297
 Picknell, William L., 163
 Piloty, professor at Munich, 110
 Pine, Robert Edge, 23
 Paints the Hon. Francis Hopkinson, 24
 Early life, 25
 Studies of distinguished heads, 25
 Portrait of Mrs. Reid, 27
 Pissarro 274
 Pittsburgh, Carnegie Institute, 325
Pittsburgh, John Alexander, 318
Pittsburgh, Pa., Colin Campbell Cooper, 334
Plein Air, 123, 265
Pointilliste, 273
Pomona, John La Farge, 147
Portrait, Wilton Lockwood, 260
Portrait, A, Irving R. Wiles, 252
Portrait, The, Will H. Low, 158
Portrait Group, G. de F. Brush, 180
Portrait Group, John S. Sargent, 251
Portrait of a Lady, R. D. Grauley, 357
Portrait of the Artist, John Vanderlyn, 61
Portrait of the Artist, C. L. Elliot, 95
 Pratt, Matthew, 23
 Paint Shop Signs, 26
 Visits West in London, 29
 The American School, 28
 Puritanic Influence, 6, 166
 Puvis de Chavannes, 323
 Quartley, Arthur, 163
 Quidor, teacher of Charles L. Elliott, 94
Quincey, Portrait of Mrs. Norton, Unknown, 4
Rainy Night, A, C. Hassam, 280
 Ranger, Henry W., 213
 Landscape, 212
 Realism, 101, 288, 381
 Coloristic, 110
 In literature, 230
 Painting, 233, 237
 Newer, 269
Redemption, Dogma of The, J. S. Sargent, 322
 Redfield, The Valley, 346
Reflection, The, B. R. Fitz, 170
Reid, Portrait of Mrs., R. E. Pine, 27
 Reid, Robert, mural decorations in Boston State House, 326
 Reinhart, Charles S., 163
 Richardson, H. H., 304, 312
Road to the Old Farm, J. F. Murphy, 342
 Robinson, Theodore, 163
 Romanticism, 104, 109
Rome, Elihu Vedder, 328
 Rome, goal of artists, 48
 Influence of, 60
 Rood, Professor, 274
 Ryder, Albert P., 218
 Style analysed, 221
 Siegfried, 216
 Flying Dutchman, 219

INDEX

- Sailor and Sweetheart*, Gari Melchers, 354
- Sargent, John S., 245
 Career, 245
 Analysis of style, 246
 Brushwork, 250
Beatrice Goellet, 247
Marquand, Henry G., 248
Portrait Group, 251
Mrs. Carl Meyer, 244
 Mural decoration, 320
Prophets, 320
Dogma of Redemption, 322
Sargent, Portrait of Col. Epes, John S. Copley, 20
- Sartain, William, 163
- Schadow, director at Dusseldorf, 103
- Scientific study of light, 151, 152
- Scirmer, teacher at Dusseldorf, 76
- Sculptor and the King, The*, George de Forest Brush, 179
- Sea and Rocks*, Paul A. Dougherty, 240
- Seurat, 274
- Shannon, J. J., 254
Miss Kitty, Portrait of, 255
- Sheep Washing*, Horatio Walker, 224
- Shepherdess*, Gari Melchers, 350
- Shirlaw, Walter, 114
Summer Idyll, 119
- Training, 171
- Shop-signs, 26
- Shoshone Falls*, Thomas Moran, 84
- Siegfried*, Albert P. Ryder, 216
- Silver Gown, The*, H. J. Cushing, 363
- Simmons, Edward, mural decorations in Boston State House, 326
- Singleton, John, 15
- Sloan, John, 373
Easter Eve, 372
- Sluice, The*, F. B. Williams, 349
- Smedley, William T., 163
- Smibert, John, 2
 His life, 5
 His sitters, 5
Portrait of John Lovell, 7
- Society of American Artists, 162
- Solitude*, Charles Melville Dewey, 337
- South, moral atmosphere contrasted with North, 9
 Trade with England after Revolution, 47
- Spanish Fête*, F. Luis Mora, 371
- Spanish Girl*, W. Allston, 57
- Spinnet, The*, Thomas W. Dewing, 188
- Stained Glass, 154, 305
- Steichen, Edward T., 382
Lake George, 384
- Stuart, Gilbert, 10
 Early Life, 35
 Departure for London, 36
 Analysis of portraits, 36
 Portraits of Washington, 38
 Settles in Boston, 42
 Work compared with Peale and Copley, 43, 44 Portrait of Dr. Fothergill, 40
Portrait of Washington, 39
- Sully, Thomas, 88
 Early life, 88
 Analysis of painting, 89
Portrait of Eliza Leslie, 91
- Summer Idyll*, W. Shirlaw, 119
- Surgical Clinic*, T. Eakins, 228, 231
- Symbolism, 172, 287
- Synthesis, 72
- Talcott, Allen B., Calm before a Storm, 243
- Tarbell, Edmund C., Girls Reading, 271
- Thayer, Abbot H., 163, 382
 Analysis of pictures, 382
Virgin Enthroned, 183
Caritas, 184
- Theatre in Colonial Times, 9

INDEX

- In Philadelphia, 24
 Influence in Düsseldorf, 104
 Thomas, Church of Saint, mural decoration, 308
 Tiffany, Louis C., 163
Treaty of the Traverse des Sioux, Frank D. Millet, 327
Trial of Katherine of Aragon,
 Edwin A. Abbey, 195
 Trinity Church, Boston, mural decoration, 305
 Trumbull, John, early life, 49
 Studies with West, 50
 Estimate as painter, 50
 Portrait of Hamilton, 51
 Battle of Bunker Hill, 52
 Mural Decoration, 304
 ✓ Tryon, Dwight W., 382
 New England Farm in Winter, 379
 Twilight—Autumn, 380
 Moonlight, 383
 Turner, C. Y., 186
 Burning of the Peggy Stewart, 317
 Mural decoration, 325
 Opening of the Erie Canal, 326
 ✓ Twachtman, J. H., 163, 382
 Characteristics analysed, 278
 Career, 281
 Hemlock Pool, 283
 February, 284
 Twilight—Autumn, Dwight Tryon, 380
 Two Men, Eastman Johnson, 111
 Universal Geometry, 149
 Valley, The, Edward W. Redfield, 346
 Values, 242, 262
 Vanderlyn, John, 64
 Estimate of paintings, 65
 Portrait of the Artist, 61
 Ariadne, 62
 Van Ingen, The Feet Washers, 310
 Vedder, Elihu, 163
 Analysis of method, 171
 Illustrations, 171
 Symbolism, 172
Rome, 328
Corrupt Government, 329
Keeper of the Threshold, 175
 Velasquez, 238, 262, 285, 289
View of the Seine, Homer Martin, 208
 Vinton, Frederick P., 163, 257
Virgin Enthroned, Abbot H.
 Thayer, 183
 Volk, Douglas, 163, 186
 Vollon, 365
 Wagner, professor at Munich, 113
 Walker, Horatio, Ice Cutters, 220 ✓
 Wood Cutters, 223
 Sheep Washing, 224
 Ave Maria, 227
Washington, Crossing the Delaware, E. Leutze, 107
Washington, Portrait of, Charles
 Wilson Peale, 33
Washington, Portrait of, Gilbert
 Stuart, 39
 Washington, D. C., Library of Congress, 319, 323, 329
Wave, The, A. Harrison, 267 Webster, Daniel, Portrait of,
 Chester Harding, 92
 Weir, J. Alden, 163 ✓
 A Gentlewoman, 272
 The Farm in Winter, 275
Weir, Portrait of Mrs. Robert, Unknown, 3
Well and Water Tank, F. Duveneck, 112
 Wentworth, Lady, 17
 West, Benjamin, 10
 Birth and early training, 10
 Earliest portraits, 11
 Residence in England, 11
 Visited by Copley, 21
 Visited by Stuart, 36
 Teacher of Trumbull, 50
 Hagar and Ishmael, 8
 Portrait of C. W. Peale, 13
 Teacher of Sully, 89